Federal minister defends government's stance on Israel

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

The Harper government's with-us-or-against-us stance on Israel may lead to an anti-Semitic backlash, said Liberal MP Anita Neville last week.

Neville was one of several opposition MPs to question Immigration, Multiculturalism and Citizenship Minister Jason Kenney about the Conservative government's "black and white" position on Israel at a Feb. 8 hearing held by the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Anti-Semitism.

"I've had people who are traditionally supporters of Israel [say] they don't like what this government is doing in terms of turning Israel into a... black and white issue... and for stifling criticism of Israel," Neville, a Winnipeg MP and the co-chair of Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel, said in an interview after the hearing.

"I don't like the government using Israeli politics... as a wedge issue... That's not the way one does politics."

In response to similar comments at the hearing, Kenney said that he has been commended for Canada's stance on Israel and anti-Semitism.

"All I get is praise for Canada's effort to deal with these sometimes difficult issues and not to sweep them under the carpet," he said. "In terms of accusations that the government is inciting people to anti-Semitism, I just don't understand that."

Kenney acknowledged that some of the government's positions have been controversial, but said that "sometimes it's necessary to be controversial.

"Sometimes you have to say, 'I'm sorry, if someone is out there defending terrorist organizations or using implicitly anti-Semitic language, we're going to name them and if that ruffles some feathers, so be it,'" he said.

Opposition MPs brought up the de-funding of KAIROS, a Canadian church-based aid organization, as an example of the government's hardline stance on Israel.

While on a trip to Jerusalem late last year, Kenney said that KAIROS lost its government funding as an example of Canada's "zero-tolerance approach to anti-Semitism" and that it was "taking a leadership role in the boycott [of Israel]," which KAIROS denied.

Kenney and International Cooperation Minister Bev Oda later said that KAIROS was "defunded" because its goals didn't meet with Canada's new aid priorities.

"The perceptions of [the KAIROS situation] is not a good one. It's viewed as being muzzled," Neville said in an interview.

In response to criticism, Kenney denied calling KAIROS anti-Semitic, but acknowledged that he accused the group of being involved in a boycott campaign.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, said Neville's accusation that the government stance on Israel can lead to anti-Semitism is a "big statement.

"Pretty much anything could contribute to increased anti-Semitism. From the government's perspective, I think it has been consistent in identifying and acting on agencies, NGOs and programs that don't conform to its overall vision of where taxpayers' money should be directed," he said.

Jason Kenney

The Feb. 8 CPCCA hearing, which was the last of 10 hearings held to discuss the issue of anti-Semitism in Canada, included speeches from members of the RCMP and police forces from around the country.

Steve Sullivan, the federal ombudsman for victims of crime, said that victims of hate crimes report higher levels of fear, depression and anxiety than victims of other crimes.

"At the community level, the impact of hate crimes reaches far beyond the individual or the institution that's been attacked," he said. "Hate crimes can create fear among other members of the community."

Sullivan added that less than 10 per cent of victims of any crime in Canada access any victim services offered by the government, and that most victims of hate crimes turn to their family, friends and religious institutions for comfort.

Sullivan went on to say that because a hate crime affects whole communities, these support systems are often damaged due to fear.

During his speech, Kenney said that Canada's zero-tolerance approach to anti-Semitism and hate crimes includes supporting Holocaust education in Canada, working to collect hate-crime data from police forces throughout the country, and denying citizenship or permanent residence to anyone charged with, convicted of or under investigation for a war crime or a crime against humanity.

McGuinty set to visit Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty has announced that he will lead a trade mission to Israel and the West Bank in May.

The trip, from May 24 to 27, will include stops in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Ramallah and Bethlehem. A press release said the mission would expand the province's research cooperation with Israel and build more economic partnerships in health care, as well as enabling Ontario to tap into Israel's "expertise in turning good high-tech ideas into good high-tech jobs."

In 2008, two-way goods traded between Ontario and Israel totalled almost $1.1 billion, an increase of 86 per cent from 2004, according to the release. Ontario's exports to Israel have grown by more than 70 per cent since 2004, it stated.

At a press conference last Thursday at Quanser Consulting Inc. – a Markham robotic and mechatronic systems manufacturing company that was involved in a recent project with a company from Israel in the medical sector – McGuinty said he looks forward "to visiting Israel and the West Bank and promoting Ontario's world-class medical research and development.

"This is an important market for Ontario and this trade mission will strengthen cultural and commercial ties while creating jobs for Ontarians."

As part of a question-and-answer session, McGuinty said he believes "we have a special responsibility as Ontarians and Canadians to always maintain linkages and build on community values.

"It's my first trip to the Middle East. I think it's high time... and I'm very much looking forward to it."

The premier noted that this mission and previous ones to countries like India, China and Japan serve to "enhance trade ties and seek more investment here in Ontario."

Anti-Semitic comments called 'unacceptable'

In her second letter, dated Feb. 7, 2010, Mishna said that the anti-Semitic comments in question were "unacceptable and upsetting to many faculty and students," and reiterated that anti-Semitism has no place at the university.

Stung and embarrassed by the incidents, the university has taken steps to close the festering wounds.

Mishna and members of her leadership team have met with students and teachers close to the incidents in an attempt to understand what happened and open a dialogue.

Awareness and educational programs are being developed to address underlying issues.

An equity adviser within the faculty may be appointed to handle concerns raised by students about discrimination and any forms of exclusion.

Ernie Lightman

Robert Steiner, the university's vice-president of communications, said that Mishna has strived to "heal the injury," having labelled the incidents as anti-Semitic, met with students and faculty and hosted two "instructional events" with faculty members.

And in the near future, he noted, the faculty plans to host two educational events for its members.

A seminar titled "Understanding Anti-Semitism and Religious Discrimination: A Dialogue About Stereotypes, Silencing and Social Justice" is set for March 16. A seminar on "Civility, Respect and Engagement: What Is the Role in the Fight Against Racism" is to follow on March 22.

According to Ernie Lightman – a faculty member who pieced together the story but did not personally hear the offending comments – the first anti-Semitic incident took place when one or two students in Rupaleem Bhuyan's class said they did not want to visit the Baycrest geriatric health-care facility in Toronto.

In an undated, widely circulated letter to university president David Naylor, Lightman claimed that a student or students "did not want to visit a place full of old Jews, while another student did not want to go to a place with so many rich Jews."

Lightman, a professor of social policy, added, "One student said he did not feel comfortable visiting Baycrest after what Israel did in Gaza" during its invasion last year to end Palestinian rocket attacks on Israeli territory.

"That students would express these types of comments is not necessarily unusual," wrote Lightman, who's currently in Israel on a sabbatical and could not be reached for elaboration.

"What is surprising is that the discussion would be sanctioned – or encouraged – by Rupaleem."

Lightman said that Bhuyan – an academic of South Asian descent who was born and raised in the United States and whose background is in international studies, cultural anthropology and social welfare – could have "shut down" the discussion and turned it into "a teachable moment."

Instead, she tacitly acquiesced to, or actively promoted, the problematic discussion, thereby allowing or encouraging the students "to act out their agendas of hate and ignorance," charged Lightman, who has since decided to "accelerate" his retirement on the grounds that he does not wish to be "a part of a department where anti-Semitic discourse is an acceptable teaching tool."

Asked what transpired in the second incident, Steiner replied, "I do not know what was said in that meeting."

After the students visited Baycrest, Lightman writes, the discussion was resumed in Bhuyan's class. "At this point, [it] turned to the number of Jewish faculty in the [social work] department... Once again, Rupaleem did nothing to channel the discussion in a more constructive direction, but instead sanctioned – or actively encouraged – the promulgation of hate."

Accusing Bhuyan of trying to suppress the incidents, Lightman wrote, "Secrecy in the classroom is, of course, antithetical to everything the university stands for… " In an allusion to the Ku Klux Klan, he wrote, "We can't… hide under white sheets of secrecy – with or without burning crosses."

Further, Lightman claimed Mishna did not inform faculty of what exactly had happened before writing her letters.

In her Feb. 7 letter, Mishna expressed disappointment with Lightman's letter, saying it had unnecessarily caused "further distress in the community" and had not contributed "positively to our efforts to move forward in addressing these issues."

Asked to explain her role in the affair, Bhuyan replied, "I don't wish to make a comment. I have nothing to say."

Pressed for an explanation, she said, "This has really been hurtful to me and my family, and I don't think a comment will be useful."

Before impatiently ending the impromptu telephone interview, she lashed out at Lightman, describing him as "a destructive person."

Adrienne Chambon, Bhuyan's colleague and the director of the faculty's PhD program, suggested that the anti-Semitic comments in Bhuyan's class did not occur in a vacuum.

"It takes two to tango. These kind of conversations don't develop unless they are allowed to happen."

Chambon, who described herself as "a European Jew" of French and Romanian ancestry, said she has no idea whether Bhuyan is an anti-Semite. "I've struggled with that. It's a very difficult question."

She added, "As a Jewish person, I don't really feel safe. Nor do some of the students feel safe either. This becomes a psychological problem."

Mishna has said that the university "greatly values its partnership and collaboration" with Baycrest.

Steiner denied that the university tried to hush up the incidents.

"There has been no attempt to cover up anything," he said, adding that the university's goal is to ensure that everyone – students and faculty – feels "safe and comfortable" on campus.

Friends of Haifa U president aims to promote diversity

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Michael Dan's connection to the Canadian Friends of Haifa University started with a wedding gift.

A $2-million wedding gift.

In spring of 2006, just before he got married, Dan started thinking about getting his future wife a present.

"Around that time, she had made a comment to me about how, of all the Israeli universities, she was particularly sympathetic towards the University of Haifa," he said.

Dan decided to create a $2-million endowment fund in his wife's name, which funds doctoral fellowships in the humanities for underprivileged students.

Since then, he has continued to support the university, and was recently appointed as the Canadian Friends of Haifa University's new president. His official term with the organization, which helps raise funds and awareness for the University of Haifa, started last week.

Michael Dan

Apart from his new role, Dan is the president of Gemini Power Corp., a power generation company and of Regulus Investment Inc. He's also a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada, and a diplomate of the American Board of Neurological Surgeons.

Dan's respect for the University of Haifa has to do with its policy of inclusion and diversity. Arabs make up about 20 per cent of its student population.

"It's something I deeply believe in, the story of this university that teaches young Israelis about coexistence. About working towards higher secondary degrees [in] an atmosphere of tolerance and mutual respect," he said.

According to Dan, North Americans don't understand how segregated the Israeli education system is. There are about four different educational streams, Dan said, adding that Arabs and Jews are often separated through these streams.

This gets worse at the end of high school, Dan added, explaining that this is because Jews enter the military and Arabs don't.

"By the time university comes around, you have age differences between Jews and Arabs. You have a difference in military experience," he said.

"The University of Haifa brings all these people together from diverse backgrounds who, for the first times in their lives, are interacting with each other and learning with each other. I think that's amazing."

As president of the Canadian Friends of Haifa University, Dan would like to see the group's board of governors reflect the university's diversity. His goal is for 20 per cent of the board to be made up of Arabs.

"We have a wonderfully diverse Arab population in Canada... they're not very well represented at traditionally Jewish functions," he said. "We have one [Arab] woman on our board, and I think we need more."

Karen Mock, who will run as the Liberal candidate in Thornhill riding in the next federal election, stepped down as president of the Canadian Friends of Haifa University after a term of one year.

"I felt it would just be wonderful to have Michael [as president]... I was just thrilled to be able to put Michael's name forward because of his commitment and his dedication to the university," she said. "I think that... [he'll] set a wonderful tone for moving forward and strengthening the Canadian Friends of Haifa University and garnering more support in Canada."

מקהלת הנצנה, שביצעה שירים של בן וברלוק, נהנתה מעיבודים יפים של אלונה יהושקין, ובה בלטה במיוחד אדרלי בדצ', לצידם של ליאורה כץ, אשתי בלשמאלצ, מיכה ושירה בדצ'.

עבורי היתה זו הנינה אמיתית, כי קהילה אמיתית נמדדת ביכולתה ליצר את הכלים של עצמה, ולא דוקא בהנהרות של טלויזיקאים ישראלים מקומיים, שהדבה מעמים רק מדברים אך עושים מעט מאוד. אבל שיאאר בינינו.

92-year-old woman makes aliyah

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

At 92 years old, Rachel Kanner could easily sit back and relax.

Instead, she's packed up her North York apartment, where she lived alone, and made aliyah.

A widow "for at least 30 years," with no children of her own, Kanner said she's joining her "adopted" family.

In an interview Jan. 22, just prior to her departure date, Kanner said that although she had lived in Canada since 1952, her heart had always been in Israel.

She participated in UJA Federation's Walk with Israel for at least 33 years and volunteered with Sar-El Volunteers for Israel "many times.

"I was always raising money for Israel. I knocked on people's doors, and no one was safe when I came along."

A longtime member of Congregation Darchei Noam, Kanner said she went to all of the Reconstructionist synagogue's events. "If I wasn't there, nothing was happening."

She credits yoga with contributing to her long life. "I started teaching yoga in Jerusalem, and continued here at night school and private schools. It helped me maintain my great shape."

She was born in Eden, Germany, in 1917, where her father, Samuel Blum, was the chief rabbi of the province. In 1939, as a result of Kristallnacht, her parents and two younger siblings left for Palestine, but her parents sent Kanner to England with two brothers because they were only allowed to bring children under eight years old with them.

"At 17 years old, I was separated from my family and was working as a domestic for a rabbi's family. After the war, I was lucky enough to be one of the first to go to Palestine. I lived there until I left for Canada."

Rachel Kanner

Her "grandson" Doron Gechman, who came to help Kanner make the move, said his family met Kanner about eight years ago on one of her visits to Israel, and they had an "instant connection.

"We discovered that my grandfather and her grandfather came from the same city, and we just started talking from there. We have adopted her to our family," Gechman said.

He said it took his family a long time to convince Kanner to move to Israel. "We're thrilled that it is actually happening."

Kanner said the family was finally able to convince her because she realized that "it is important to have my family around me. I'm alone here, and I need family support."

She stresses, however, that she has rented an apartment in Ashdod, where her adopted family lives, and will continue to live on her own. "Now, we can spend Shabbat together."

"For a number of years I was 'nisht ahear and nisht ahein.' My body was here and my soul was there. Now I'm combining my body and soul. I'll be all together."

Traditional Purim sweets add to the fun

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

When baking hamantashen, it doesn't matter if you fashion your favourite dough into Haman's hat, pocket or ears, these recipes will ensure that your Purim is festive, fun and delicious.

Cooking Tip

To fold dough into the shape of a hamantash (a triangle), use both thumbs and the two first fingers on each hand. Slide two fingers from left hand under left side and two fingers from right hand under right side and two thumbs under the bottom of circle. Bring all fingers (with dough) together to form a triangle and try to pinch close. Repeat this process with remaining circles and dough.

CREAM CHEESE HAMANTASHEN

I got this recipe from an old Gourmet magazine in 1997 and it's fantastic!

2 cups all-purpose flour
1/4 cup sugar
1/8 tsp. salt
1/2 cup cold unsalted butter, cut into bits
1/2 cup cream cheese, cut into bits
1 large egg yolk
1 tsp. vanilla
2/3 cup filling (apricot or cherry jam, ready made poppy seed or prune filling)

In a bowl, with a pastry blender, or in a food processor, blend or pulse flour, sugar and salt to combine and add butter and cream cheese, blending or pulsing until mixture resembles coarse crumbs.

In a small bowl, stir together yolk and vanilla and add to flour mixture, blending or pulsing just until mixture begins to come together (do not overmix). Gather dough into a ball and flatten into a disk. Chill dough, wrapped in plastic wrap, at least 1 hour and up to 2 days.

Preheat oven to 375. Divide the dough in half. On a lightly floured cool surface, knead half the dough (keeping other half wrapped and chilled) 2 or 3 times to make it less crumbly. Roll out dough 1/4-inch thick, and with a 3-inch cutter, cut out as many rounds as possible. Transfer rounds with a metal spatula to a large baking sheet, arranging about 1/2 inch apart. Reroll scraps and cut out more rounds. Put 1 teaspoon filling in centre of each round and fold up edges to form triangular cookies resembling a tricornered hat, pinching corners together and leaving filling exposed. (Pinch dough tightly enough so seams are no longer visible and sides are taut enough to prevent cookies from leaking the filling as they bake.)

Bake hamantashen in middle of oven 20 minutes, or until pale golden. Cool hamantashen on baking sheet 5 minutes and transfer to racks to cool completely. Make more hamantashen with remaining dough and filling in same manner. Hamantashen keep in an airtight container at room temperature for 5 days. Makes 2 dozen.

CHERRY ORANGE HAMANTASHEN

3/4 cup margarine or butter, softened
3/4 cup sugar
1 large egg
1 tsp. orange juice concentrate
1 tsp. vanilla
1/4 tsp. salt
up to 1 tbsp. of water
1 can cherry pie filling, slightly drained of the gooey syrup
3 tbsp. breadcrumbs
2 1/4 cups flour
powdered sugar for garnish

In the bowl of an electric mixer, cream together the margarine or butter and sugar. Add the egg, orange juice concentrate and vanilla. Beat to combine. Add in the flour and salt.

Beat in the water a few drops at a time until dough starts to come away from sides of bowl (you can do this in a food processor). Place the dough on wax paper and push it into a flat disk. Place another sheet of wax paper on top and wrap the dough in foil. Refrigerate for at least 2 hours or as long as overnight.

At baking time, preheat oven to 350. In a bowl, combine the slightly drained cherry pie filling and bread crumbs. Mix to combine.

On a floured surface, roll out the dough until it's about 1/4-inch thick. Using a round cookie cutter, cut out circles. Spoon 2 to 3 cherries and a little bit of filling onto the dough circles and form into triangles. Place on a cookie sheet lined with baking paper. Bake for 12-15 minutes or until just starting to turn pale golden. Remove from oven and cool on rack. When cool, dust with powdered sugar and serve. Makes 2 to 3 dozen depending on the size circle you cut out.

CHOCO BERRY HAMANTASHEN

1/2 cup margarine or butter
3/4 cup sugar
1 egg
1 tsp. vanilla
1 1/2 cups flour
1/2 cup cocoa
1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/4 tsp. salt
1 jar raspberry preserves

Grease 2 cookie sheets. In an electric mixer, combine the margarine, sugar, egg and vanilla and beat until fluffy.

In another bowl, combine the cocoa, flour, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Mix to combine and then add to the margarine mixture. Do not over mix. Divide dough in half and chill for one hour.

Preheat oven to 350. On a lightly floured surface, roll out the dough to approx. 1/4 inch thick. Cut into rounds 3- to 4-inch works best. Place approx. 1 teaspoon raspberry preserves in centre of each circle and fold into shape. Pinch the corners and place on prepared cookie sheet, two inches apart (these will expand). Bake for 15 minutes. Cool on a wire rack.

Jewish boys and girls clubs still going strong!

By KEN BORDEN
Special to The CJN

"So what are we going to do today?" This was a question I was asked just about every day.

The usual answer was: "Wait a minute, I'll call you back. I just want to check with Jerry."

This was my life as a Jewish teenager growing up in Toronto in the late '30s and early '40s, the "War years." It was a small world we lived in, with St.Clair Avenue to the north, Lake Ontario to the south, Yonge Street to the east and Dovercourt Street to the west – a small world indeed!

We rarely strayed outside these boundaries. "Outside" was uncomfortable, very uncomfortable. In those times, anti-Semitism was big and very visible, too visible. We kept to our own little world where we felt safe.

We had the benefit and protection of the YMHA at Brunswick Avenue and College Street, our home away from home, our shelter from the outside stormy blast of our adversaries. The Y gave us the athletic and social outlets that any generation requires. As well, the Y gave us club rooms, our very own "hideouts," so to speak. They were ours – they really were. We decorated them with our own original crests and logos, furnished them with sofas and chairs, organized weekly meetings, just like the Canadian Parliament, with voting on what to do, when to do it and who to do it with, things like parties with girls or dates. After all, athletics weren't everything! The Jewish boys of Toronto formed "clubs" because the Y was there with those beautiful rooms for us. All we required was a Y membership and we were "in."

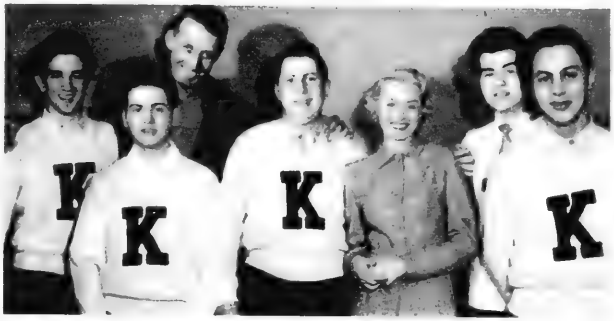
The teenaged Jewish girls of Toronto followed suit. They also had their clubs, and we often had joint meetings and joint socials. Believe me, a lot of marriages resulted, all because the YMHA gave our generation that home away from home.

Here's the best news! Those clubs of yesteryear are still alive and well and thriving in Toronto!

This may well make Toronto unique in the whole wide world: the guys and gals that grew up here are still here, still having meetings, still having socials, still having fun. Very few cities can make that statement. That's why this story is so beautiful.

Where else can you find a bunch of "boys" in their late 70s getting together weekly and monthly for one basic reason: we actually "love" one another? We all come from the same schools, same neighbourhoods, attended the same camps, same summer resorts, Jackson's Point, Crystal Beach, Pontypool, to name a few.

We all belong to each other, we care for each other. We all know what everybody else is doing and how they feel. We visit each other in hospitals, at shivahs, and simply drop in to visit when we feel like it. We are the luckiest bunch of guys in the world. Outsiders from Buffalo, Montreal, Hamilton, Rochester are jealous when they hear of our unique Toronto set up. You should hear them rave!



Members of Club Kenton in 1950

Two of the more famous clubs from those wonderful days of yore are Club Kenton and Club Dumaurier. They are currently organizing a joint club dinner sometime in May 2010. We'll need space for at least 30 to 45 well-behaved kibbitzers, aged 77 to 84 or so. (We are very few, if any, drinkers.)

If I gave you a complete list of their names and nicknames, you'd hear Damon Runyan roll over. How about Spider, the Mole, Gwartzer, Itch, the Apple, the Boston Bachelor, Wild Bill, Zel, Noody, the Doc, Tiler, the Shnoz, Givvie, Blackie, Le Mieux, Blondie, the Mick.

Club Kenton meets the first Thursday of the month for breakfast, with lots of guests attending the fun event, and it has a dinner-of-the-month somewhere (a different restaurant each month), with added "friends" in attendance. Sometimes it's standing room only.

Club Dumaurier meets often as well, with dinners, days at the track, nights at the track, events at the various casinos. They are definitely men of action.

So here we are in 2010. We are all in our late 70s or early 80s, all with hurts and pains, plenty of bladder problems, lots of handicap permits, tons of doctor visits, no more Palais Royal dance hall to hunt in, no more late nights, lots of forgetfulness, and on and on. But we have each other and we cherish every minute. We're still great laughers and jokers, and we major in kibbitzing.

The most important thing is we are still together and loving it! If we add the other clubs, some a year or two our senior, some a year or two our junior, and the girls clubs, you are talking about 300 or so members. After all, this began circa 1939! That's 71 years of still "playing" with our old original friends! Who else can boast of having friends this long?

Remember, all of the other cities of North America lost this generation years ago, but not Toronto. We are the brotherhood of a past generation, and we're rolling, still here in good old Toronto – or should it be "Toronto the good"?

JACS helps take lid off addiction

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

David Rosenberg wants to know why the community is only whispering about one of the most prevalent diseases of the 21st century.

As development co-ordinator and fundraiser for JACS (Jewish Addiction Community Services), Rosenberg says that addiction affects 30 per cent of the population. "That means if 10 people go to a wedding and try alcohol, statistics say that three won't stop drinking.

"[Addiction] doesn't discriminate against Jews. It is independent of upbringing. Unlike cancer or heart disease, though, no one is screaming about it. People are in denial about addictions, including the addicts themselves. It's a tricky disease. Addicts need to learn that they are not responsible for having the disease, but they are responsible for arresting it."

A recovering crack cocaine addict who "owes his life to JACS," Rosenberg said that especially in an economic downturn, "people are afraid of life, and what do they do if they're in pain? They get an anesthetic."

Since last year, JACS has seen a 150 per cent increase in clients, he said, "and our donations are down. It is a real challenge."

In addition to being an information resource on the effects that addictions have on family life, JACS has a drop-in lounge, teen programs – including a Sunday group for young men – a women's group, a concerned parents' group, and a group for those who wish to explore the Alcoholics Anonymous 12-steps in a framework of traditional Jewish spiritual concepts.

JACS' 12-step groups for addicts include Cocaine Anonymous, Narcotics Anonymous and Gamblers Anonymous, and it offers a weekly Families Anonymous group and a recovery service on Shabbat that combines 12-steps and Judaism.

Rosenberg said that he gave up his anonymity to get people through the door. "I was fortunate enough to be given a second chance, and I'm here because so many other people are suffering. It is a tough sell, though because the community is in denial."

Speaking from personal experience, he said addicts have an inability to face life on their own terms. "If they don't like what is happening, they try to manipulate life."

When he came out of rehab, he said, he knew he needed a program to teach him to survive. "At first, I attended self-help groups in church basements, but they just weren't for me," he said.

"Finally, about two years ago, I ran into someone who told me to try JACS. I walked in and I was immediately comfortable. The door is open to all denominations, but it uses Jewish traditions. I started identifying with other Jews in recovery. Having a Jewish place to recover is such a gift."

He began volunteering at JACS, he said, and "I was here all the time. If this place wasn't here, I'm not sure I would have made it. People look out for me."

He began recommending JACS, he said, "and eventually I was asked if I could help raise some money, so I started telling my story. It is a small price to pay to live a good life."

Now, he said, "I watch miracles every day. People are getting their lives back. We all recover together because we see our own disease in someone else. It becomes a fellowship."

The best thing of all, he said, is the discovery that "our feelings do not have to be numbed. The 12-step approach teaches us acceptance, and helps us produce good feelings and a good self-esteem.

"I can never forget, though, that I have an illness. The minute I stop doing my work, I will go back to my old behaviour."

If he sits down with a person who has relapsed, he said, "I know that 100 per cent of the time, he was not following the program. It is work, but it is good work. You have to take one day at a time."

HIP-HOP BAND DISPLAYS ISRAEL'S DIVERSITY

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to the CJN

Sha'anan Street is a familiar face on the Israeli hip-hop scene. For 14 years, the burly, 38-year-old Jerusalem rapper has been leading Hadag Nahash, arguably Israel's most popular hip-hop group.

Together, the six-member band has been turning out hit after hit, experimenting with an impressive array of musical genres and pushing the political envelope with socially conscious lyrics.

But despite having almost a decade and a half of musical innovation and commercial success behind it, the veteran hip-hop outfit isn't willing to give up its place at the forefront of Israeli culture.

In 2008, four of its songs were featured on the soundtrack to the Adam Sandler movie You Don't Mess with the Zohan, exposing the band to a worldwide audience.

Now, with the release of its new album, 6, and a North American tour culminating with a Feb. 28 show at the Mod Club in Toronto, Hadag Nahash is proving that they're still ahead of the game.

"I would say that we took another step with this album," said Streett, en route from his home in Jerusalem to a show at the popular Tel Aviv venue The Barbie.

"We took it to psychedelic places, we took it to reggae places. I feel that we recorded solid tunes in a bunch of different genres."

The new album also features four songs in English, something Hadag Nahash never did on any of its previous five releases.

"I speak decent English, and a lot of times when we're jamming in the studio and rehearsal room, we're going to be jamming in English, and we decided, 'Let's record this stuff,'" Streett said.

While the album's official release party won't be until March 25 in Tel Aviv, Hadag Nahash's new material will be on display when the band takes to the stage in Toronto.

"We're going to try out a whole bunch of new tunes on all you guys," Streett said. "Toronto is the last date on our tour, so we should be very much ready by then."

Sponsored by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU) as part of its Be U Be Hebrew campaign, the concert coincides with Purim and includes a costume contest with a free summer course at Hebrew U as the top prize. Proceeds from the concert will go toward the university's Vidal Sassoon International Center for the Study of Antisemitism.

The show also takes place at the beginning of Israeli Apartheid Week, a pro-Palestinian event held each year on university campuses across North America, that advocates for a boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel.

According to Ravid Dahan, the band's North American manager and director of Motek Productions, the timing of the concert is intentional.

"Purim isn't necessarily the best time to go out on tour, but for us it's important to do it now because of Israeli Apartheid Week," she said.

Moshik Galanty, CFHU's director of student recruitment and alumni relations, agreed.

"The anti-Israel [elements] managed to make the apartheid week a national thing in Canada. Everyone knows what it is, and what we're trying to do is to create a week of pro-Jewish pride," Galanty said.

"The concert itself is a fun event. It's Purim, it's a costume party, it's going to be a very nice event that students can participate in."

Despite Hadag Nahash's de-facto role as ambassadors of Israeli culture, the band has made a name for itself – and distinguished itself from other Israeli hip-hop artists such as Subliminal – based on the left-wing, anti-establishment content of its songs.

Numbers, a track from the 2003 album Lazooz (Move), compares the wages of Israeli CEOs with the unemployment rates and poverty of other citizens. More controversially, the song Gabi and Debi contrasts the Zionist ideals taught in Israeli schools with everyday societal problems, and depicts Theodore Herzl, the founder of the Zionist movement, doing drugs.

The band's most famous track, The Sticker Song, from its 2004 album Homer Mekomi (Local Material), was written by acclaimed Israeli novelist David Grossman, and takes its lyrics from the plethora of political bumper stickers plastered on cars in Israel.

According to Streett, however, while Hadag Nahash doesn't often support the policies of the Israeli government, it does illustrate the diversity of opinions within the country and the ability of different sides to have their voices heard.

"It's definitely true that there are few good things I can say about any [member of the] establishment, any prime minister or any government that's been around in this country ever since I've been born, but the fact is that Israel is a democracy and that we are allowed to sing what we believe in," Streett said.

"I had a meeting with some guy in the [prime minister's office] and I said to him, 'Have you read our lyrics? You know that we're not going to put any Israeli flags behind the stage and we're not going to change even one word in one song,'" Streett recalled. "But he said, 'Israel is a democracy and we're proud of the fact that we allow different voices to be heard in this country.'"

Hadag Nahash also uses its shows as a chance to reach out to Palestinians and fellow peace activists. At a performance in Austin, Texas, Streett talked to Palestinian activists from the stage, inviting them to put aside their differences for one night and join the party.

"Hadag Nahash is pro any peace activist in the world from any religion," Streett said.

"Anybody who's helping push this region in the direction of peace and not of war, anybody from any religion or any ethnicity who's helping push my hometown, Jerusalem, to a state where there's no more mess, is welcome at our show."

Hadag Nahash performs in Toronto on Feb. 28 at the Mod Club, located at 722 College St. For tickets and info call 647-889-0071.

Iran declares itself a nuclear state

JTA

JERUSALEM— Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad announced that Iran has produced its first highly enriched uranium, a day after he said that Israel must be finished off "once and for all."

Ahmadinejad announced the successful production of Iran's first package of highly enriched uranium, two days after he ordered the processing to begin.

The president of the Islamic Republic told the country on live television Feb. 11 that Iran had become a nuclear state. He added, however, that the country is not building nuclear weapons.

"We have the capability to enrich uranium more than 20 per cent or 80 per cent, but we don't enrich [to this level] because we don't need it," he said in the speech.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

The announcement came a day after Ahmadinejad told Syrian President Bashar Assad in a phone conversation reported by Reuters citing Iran's state broadcaster that "If the Zionist regime should repeat its mistakes and initiate a military operation, then it must be resisted with full force to put an end to it once and for all."

Meanwhile, the European Jewish Congress on Feb. 9 called on European and other members of the UN Security Council to immediately move toward applying "crippling sanctions" against Iran over its refusal to scale back its nuclear program.

Canada's foreign minister, Lawrence Cannon, expressed disappointment with Iran's latest decision to further enrich unanium.

"Canada is deeply disappointed by the Iranian regime's decision to further enrich its nuclear material – in defiance of UN Security Council resolutions. This regime continues to blatantly ignore its international obligations, and this threatens global security.

"Canada and the international community will not accept the regime's latest moves, which bring Iran considerably closer to possessing weapons-grade material. Iran must suspend its enrichment activity and take immediate steps toward transparency and compliance.

"Iran's regime must address the serious lack of confidence that members of the international community have in its government.

"As Prime Minister [Stephen] Harper said on Feb 11, Canada will continue to work with our allies to find strong and viable solutions, including sanctions, to hold Iran to account.

Canon also said that Canada would use its G8 presidency to continue to focus international attention and action on the Iranian regime. In this regard, he said, he would be raising the issue at the G8 Foreign Ministers' meeting in Gatineau in March.

"The Government of Canada is also seriously concerned with the Iranian regime's continued stifling of democracy, its blatant disregard of basic human rights and its irresponsible behaviour – behaviour that is threatening regional and global stability. It is completely unacceptable that the regime continues to use brute force and intimidation in responding to peaceful demonstrations."

United Nations set to pass tighter sanctions

Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

NEW YORK — Senior United Nations officials told Ha'aretz that a Security Council resolution tightening the sanctions on Iran is likely going to be approved.

Observers in both New York and Washington estimate that China will think twice about using its veto on a resolution after Russia recently threw its support behind a move against Iran. A veto could expose Beijing as isolated and out of touch with its fellow Security Council members.

China could also abstain from voting and allow the decision to be made by a simple majority. However, the sources told Ha'aretz, the United States is still trying to obtain Chinese support for the sanctions.

Ahead of its push for international sanctions at the UN, the U.S. sought on Wednesday to ratchet up pressure on Iran by imposing its own sanctions on elements of Iran's Revolutionary Guard Corps, which western intelligence officials believe is spearheading Iran's nuclear program.

The U.S. Treasury Department said it was freezing the assets in U.S. jurisdictions of Revolutionary Guard Gen. Rostam Qasemi and four subsidiaries of a previously penalized construction firm he runs because of their alleged involvement in producing and spreading weapons of mass destruction.

U.S. officials said the measures were intended as a model for wider action at the UN.

"The United States is seeking to reach a consensus between the five permanent members of the UN Security Council on the sanctions issue," one of the sources said. "This would allow it to present the five superpowers as a united coalition, which would increase the impact of the sanctions."

Following the announcement, the Canada-Israel Committee praised Canada for taking a leadership role in highlighting Iran's dismal human rights record. However it urged the Canadian government to remain vigilant when it comes to Iran.

"The time for action is now; Canada cannot wait forever as Iran stalls for time while continuing to develop its nuclear weapons capability, which threatens not only the Middle East, but global peace and security," said Moshe Ronen, national chair of the CIC.

The CIC urged the government to join other countries more fully in confronting this global threat by including Revolutionary Guard on its list of designated terrorist entities and targeting the proliferation and terrorism activities of the Iranian regime under the Special Economic Measures Act.

According to estimates in Washington and New York, a first American draft for the new resolution will be circulated among Security Council members in early March at the latest, and the vote will take place at the end of the month.

"To be honest, nobody knows for certain at the moment what China is going to do," a senior official in New York told Ha'aretz. "But at the end of the day, China is sensitive about its position as a superpower, and will not be able to ignore the position of other superpowers, including Russia, who support tightening the sanctions. It's not going to go against them by undermining the resolution."

The New York Times on Wednesday quoted officials in the Obama administration who said the U.S. president has been applying the same persuasion tack with China he earlier successfully used with Russian president Dmitry Medvedev.

According to the Times, Obama has placed sanctions on Iran at the top of his priorities in recent contacts with Beijing.

Experts, however, warned that the same tactics that brought success with Russia may not work with China. A scheduled White House visit by the Dalai Lama has infuriated the Chinese, as did a recent arms deal between the U.S. and Taiwan.

The Americans had earlier planned to begin promoting the resolution in February. France, which supports a tough line on Iran, is this month's president of the Security Council.

Israel aid group opens child centre in Haiti

JTA

JERUSALEM — An Israeli aid agency has established a child education centre in a refugee camp in Haiti.

IsraAID partnered with local aid agencies to open the centre in the Petionville Refugee Camp, the largest refugee camp in Port-au-Prince, on the site of a former golf course.

The camp has 60,000 Haitians living under the patronage of the American ambassador. The Israeli team already has provided medical post-trauma treatment to thousands of refugees in the camp.

The child education centre is operating in tents that had been used for an Israeli field hospital donated by the Israel Defence Forces. Activities such as teaching, music, sports and earthquake readiness training will be held for 250 children at a time.

A similar centre is expected to open this week at another refugee site.

The IsraAID missions to Haiti are funded by the American Jewish Committee and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, B'nai Brith International and the Jewish Federation of Metropolitan Chicago, as well as a number of other Jewish federations, including Los Angeles, Cleveland, St. Louis, San Francisco, New York and Miami.

To date, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has raised $817,742 through its Haiti Relief Fund.

Israel Briefs

Security fence moved

Israel has begun work to reroute a section of the West Bank security barrier near a Palestinian village that has been the site of weekly protests. The work began last Thursday near the Palestinian village of Bil'in, more than two years after Israel's Supreme Court ordered it moved to enable Palestinian farmers access to their land. The new route will give more than 800,000 square yards of land back to Palestinian farmers.

Israeli strike hits terrorist

Israeli air strikes hit a squad of Palestinian terrorists preparing to carry out an attack near the Karni crossing in northern Gaza last Thursday. Earlier Thursday morning, Palestinians fired a missile at an Israel Defence Forces patrol on the Israeli side of the security fence near the central Gaza Strip. The Israeli soldiers returned fire, the IDF said.

Israeli synagogue burned

A Conservative synagogue in southern Israel was burned. The fire set Monday night to the Shira Hadasha synagogue in Arad in the Negev scorched the outside of the building, but was extinguished before it damaged the inside, the Jerusalem Post reported last Wednesday. The attack comes a year after another attempt to burn down the synagogue and days after an attempted break-in there, according to the Post. Shira Hadasha is the only non-Orthodox synagogue in Arad, the Post reported. Israel has 60 Conservative synagogues. Police have no suspects in the attack, according to the newspaper.

Classroom investment

World ORT is investing $12.6 million (US) to install 400 "smart classrooms" throughout northern Israel. Through its programmatic arm in Israel, Kadima Mada, World ORT said it will begin with 72 relatively under-resourced Jewish and non-Jewish schools, which will benefit some 40,000 students a year.

Palestinians appeal to UN over museum

Palestinian families appealed to the United Nations to prevent the construction of a museum on the site of an ancient Muslim cemetery in Jerusalem. The challenge to the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Museum of Tolerance, announced at a news conference Wednesday in Jerusalem and Geneva, is being led by the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights.

Tel Aviv, Toronto exchanges launch 'a great relationship'

Chadda added, "We are very pleased to start the beginning of a great relationship in signing this MoU. We couldn't have picked a better partner."

Raymond King, the senior manager of Global Diversified Industrials at the TSX, said that a cross-listing agreement "would allow each exchange to list companies from the other jurisdiction without having to duplicate efforts and costs. From the listed company's perspective, it makes the whole process easier, more cost effective, and more time efficient."

The MoU represents the culmination of more than two years of effort on the part of the TSX and the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce to build relationships with and educate Israeli companies about listing on the TSX, and encourage them to launch initial public offerings, or IPOs.

The TSX decided to make the effort after losing two Israeli companies that had filed IPO prospectuses on the TSX at the end of 2007, but were prevented from following through due to the onset of the global capital market collapse.

"We have gotten a very positive response from Israeli companies. The fact that we kept coming, in a down marketplace, showed a lot of Israelis that we were serious," said King, who has met with dozens of venture capital firms, private equity investors, and other decision makers over the course of his nine visits to Israel over the last few years.

If the economy stays stable and investors stay open, King estimates that the TSX will have five to seven Israeli companies on board by the end of 2010.

He said the exchange presents Israeli companies with a unique and valuable opportunity, not only because of the pool of financing available or because of the TSX's free advisory service for listed companies and their venture capitals, but because of the exchange's graduated system, ideal for earlier stage companies.

On larger exchanges such as the Nasdaq, the market capitalization ceiling for even the smallest nano cap companies, companies with a market value below $50 million (all figures US), is very high at $300 million. The TSX enables smaller companies to start out on the junior TSX Venture Exchange and then, once they are ready, to graduate to the senior TSX.

According to King, one of the major problems Israeli companies have on the Nasdaq is that, although they may meet the minimum listing requirements, they have faced a high failure rate there in terms of sustaining their listing. They are too small for the analyst and investor communities on the Nasdaq, so their liquidity drops, and in weeks they become what are called orphan companies.

The TSX offers more of a gradual, stepping-stone approach.

There are many other benefits to listing in Canada, said Alan Litwack, a lawyer with Miller Thomson LLP in Toronto, who attended the MoU ceremony. Litwack, along with colleagues from Deloitte and Mackie Research Capital, initiated a conference for Israeli companies affiliated with the MIT Enterprise Forum of Israel that followed the MoU ceremony.

"The Canadian markets haven't suffered as much as the British and U.S. markets, and we have a strong reputation for respectability, accountability, and compliance," Litwack said, adding that, relative to the United States, there is also a lot less litigation in the Canadian market.

"There is not the same spectre of legal threats in Canada as there is in the U.S," he said, adding that, in all respects, it's simply cheaper and easier to list in Canada.

The Canadian MoU is the fifth such international MoU that the TASE has signed in the past few years. It has signed others with the London Stock Exchange, Nasdaq , NYSE-Euronext (USA and Europe), and the Shanghai Stock Exchange.

Yehuda Raveh, the honorary president of the Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce and Industry, sees this alliance as an opportunity for smaller companies.

"While Israeli companies have listed on other exchanges, the potential with the Toronto Stock Exchange is enormous and we believe that for medium-sized or smaller Israeli technology companies, this is the best stock exchange to float in," he said.

For Allen, the agreement represents an important partnership between two countries.

"This [MoU] is part of growing co-operation between Canada and Israel," Allen said. "It's our 60th year of bilateral relations and this is a great cherry on the top of the cake."

Arrest made in Auschwitz sign theft

JTA

STOCKHOLM — A wanted Swedish man has been arrested in connection with the theft of the famous Auschwitz sign.

Anders Hogstrom was arrested in Stockholm, the BBC reported, a week after a Polish court issued a European-wide warrant for his arrest for allegedly ordering the theft of the metal sign reading "Arbeit Macht Frei" from the front gate of the former concentration camp, now a memorial.

Hogstrom reportedly acted as an agent for a British Nazi sympathizer who wanted the sign.

The 16-foot metal sign, which means "work makes you free," was stolen Dec. 18 and recovered across the country 72 hours later.

Experts are working to restore the sign, which had been cut into three pieces. It is not certain that the sign will be returned to its place; a copy was placed at the front gate immediately after the theft.

Some 1.1 million people, including about one million Jews, were murdered at Auschwitz.

The sign at the entrance of Auschwitz was stolen in December and recovered days later. It had been cut into three pieces.

Wage differentials common in kibbutzim: study

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The kibbutz, Israel's iconic institution, is modifying itself as it shifts away from one of its core socialistic principles.

According to a Haifa University study, more kibbutzim are paying their members differential salaries.

Shlomo Getz, director of the university's Institute for the Research of the Kibbutz and the Cooperative Idea, said that 72 per cent of kibbutzim have now adopted this model.

"The kibbutz is changing in a dramatic way," he said in an interview last week from Haifa.

Rather than compensating members equally, kibbuztim are increasingly paying them wages based on the market value of their jobs, he explained.

"Paying salaries means that the kibbutz doesn't supply all the needs of its members," he added. "Members pay for services such as food, electricity, education and transportation."

Contemporary kibbutzim can be classified by their methods of compensation, said Getz, who has been a member of a kibbutz since 1970.

On the traditional collective kibbutz, members are paid equally, regardless of the kind of work they perform.

On mixed model kibbutzim, members are given a small percentage of their salaries, plus things like free food or housing.

On renewing kibbutzim, a member's salary is exclusively based on his or her income.

There are 262 kibbutzim in Israel today, of which 72 per cent are renewing kibbutzim, three per cent are mixed model kibbutzim and the rest are collective kibbutzim.

Last year, five kibbutzim shifted to the renewing model.

"It is highly probable that by the end of 2012, the number of kibbutzim shifting to alternative models will be higher than the number of kibbutzim that did so in 2009," he said.

The population of kibbutzim has declined in recent years, from 130,000 in the 1990s to 120,000 as of 2006.

"Most of the growth in kibbutzim in recent years has come from people who were born in the city," he said.

Kibbutz compensation models began to change in 1996, when members on four kibbutzim were first permitted to keep their incomes.

Asked why compensation models on kibbutzim are changing, Getz said, "There are many reasons. Members want these changes. They want more personal freedom and less 'free riders.' And values are changing, influenced by a movement in Israeli society toward greater individualism."

Nevertheless, the kibbutz still maintains some of its old features, Getz commented.

"Major decisions are still made by members through a process of participatory democracy. And there is a sense of mutual responsibility between members, though it is more limited than it used to be."

Despite the changes it has undergone in recent years, the kibbutz still plays a stable role in the Israeli economy, accounting for about nine per cent of Israel's economic output, said Getz.

Ayalon may press charges against heckler

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel's deputy foreign minister may press charges against a student who shouted "slaughter the Jews" during his speech at Oxford University.

"The deputy foreign minister is looking into the possibility of pressing charges against the student for what is tantamount to a call for genocide," said a statement issued Wednesday by Danny Ayalon's office.

Ayalon spoke last week to the prestigious Oxford University debating society, the Oxford Union.

"This demonstrates our new policy on hatred and racism, and we will have zero tolerance for anti-Semitism, something that should have happened a long time ago," Ayalon said.

Danny Ayalon

Another protester carrying a Palestinian flag started walking toward Ayalon before security intervened and he was ejected from the hall.

Other students shouted, inside and outside the hall, that "Palestine will be free, from the river to the sea," which calls for the destruction of the State of Israel. After the event, security prevented several students from physically assaulting Ayalon.

Ayalon entered Britain this week after receiving assurances that he would not be arrested on charges of war crimes stemming from last winter's Gaza war, as was threatened to other Israeli government officials.

A statement released Feb. 9 by the Oxford Union said the demonstrators "exceeded the principles of free speech that the Society upholds. They and their remarks are not representative of this society, nor the vast majority of the audience. The Oxford Union will not tolerate this kind of behaviour by its members."

The statement said that the union's president has launched an investigation aimed at identifying those who disrupted the event in order to take disciplinary action against them.

"The Oxford Union will be apologizing to Mr. Ayalon for the actions of its members and thank him for the professional way in which he handled the situation," the statement said.

Anti-Semitic incidents up in Britain

JTA

LONDON — Israel's Gaza operation last winter spurred a record number of anti-Semitic attacks in Britain during the past year.

The organization recording anti-Semitic incidents, the Community Security Trust, reported an increase in incidents of 55 per cent from the previous year. The 924 incidents were the most since records have been kept, according to reports.

The main rise in attacks was recorded in January and February, during and after Israel's military action in the Gaza Strip. According to the CST annual report, the 628 incidents in the first six months of 2009 were more than in any entire previous year. There were 296 incidents from July to December.

"These record figures show that anti-Semitism is an increasingly significant problem for British Jews," CST spokesman Mark Gardner said. "The trend must be reversed, and we call upon decent people to speak out against anti-Semitism in all its forms."

Prime Minister Gordon Brown said that "Anti-Semitism is one of the most ancient of hatreds – and yet it constantly adapts to modern times, requiring ever greater vigilance from all of us who are determined to stand up for tolerance and for the truth. Whether online, on campus or on the streets, there is absolutely no place for racism or discrimination of any sort, and the Community Security Trust has my wholehearted support in its work with the police and the Jewish community."

Twenty-three per cent of the incidents in 2009, or 212, included some form of reference to the conflict between Israel and Hamas in Gaza. In January, 158 of the 288 incidents made reference to Gaza.

Some 124 violent assaults occurred last year, 41 per cent more than the 88 from 2008. However, violent assaults fell to 13 per cent of the total, from a high of 21 per cent in 2007.

German Jewish film festival in danger of closing

Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

Germany's only Jewish film festival is in danger of closing down due to lack of funding, the event's founder and director Nicola Galliner said on Monday.

Galliner, a London native who launched the festival in 1994, said all her appeals for funding to the Berlin municipality, which had supported the festival in the past, had been rejected.

"Suddenly they rejected us, all the doors were closed. I don't understand their attitude," she told Ha'aretz.

Barring any change, the April 2010 festival will be held in a scaled-back format. Galliner said she has managed to raise only about 40 per cent of the festival's budget, estimated at 230,000 euros.

So far only one guest from overseas has been invited to the festival, held in the Arsenal cinema near Berlin's central Potsdamer Platz from April 25 to May 9. The number of planned film broadcasts has been reduced and the festival's promotion program was canceled.

"I hope we'll be able to hold the festival," Galliner said.

Berlin Mayor Klaus Wowereit, a prominent supporter of the festival in past years, was not doing enough to help it succeed this year, Galliner told Deutsche Presse-Agentur (DPA), the German press agency, last month. "We are getting little encouragement from his office," she said.

Galliner said political considerations were probably partly behind the Berlin municipality's refusal to support the festival this year.

"They just don't care and they don't understand that it's important. In my opinion the existence of such a festival is extremely important, because there is strong xenophobia and anti-Semitism in this country."

She said it was important to have a Jewish film festival in a city like Berlin, which has a multicultural image.

Around 100 Jewish film festivals are held worldwide each year, most of them in the United States and Canada. But the Berlin event, now in its 16th year, is unique in Germany.

"Half the films in our festival are Israeli, and we're different from the American festivals because 80 per cent of our audience is not Jewish," said Galliner.

Ted Kotcheff looks back at filming Joshua Then and Now

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In preparation for a forthcoming question-and-answer session to discuss his 1985 film Joshua Then and Now, Canadian movie director Ted Kotcheff made a point of watching it for the first time in about 20 years.

"I found a lot of it funny," said Kotcheff, who will be the Toronto Jewish Film Society's special guest on Feb. 21 at 4 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre.

Adapted for the screen from his novel by the late Mordecai Richler, Joshua Then and Now is biographical, mining such perennial themes as ambition, love, romance and disillusionment.

Revolving around Joshua Shapiro, a cocky Jewish writer who climbs the greasy ladder of success, marries the "golden shikse" of his wet dreams, insinuates himself into the folds of Montreal Anglo society and finds himself embroiled in a juicy sex scandal, Kotcheff's sardonic film mainly unfolds in Montreal and London over a 30-year period.

The winner of five Genie Awards, it was Canada's entry at the Cannes Film Festival.

Kotcheff, who described Richler as his best friend, has always been drawn to his novels.

In 1974, he and Richler collaborated on The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, which became the most commercially successful Canadian movie until then, won the Golden Globe Award for best foreign film and garnered Richler and Lionel Chetwynd an Academy Award nomination for best adapted screenplay.

Kotcheff likes both films, but feels they are really quite different.

"Duddy had a stronger, more straightforward story line. Duddy Kravitz is a brash kid who wants to make it. He thinks he can become a man by owning land. Joshua is about a guy who's reassessing his life after running into trouble. Duddy is easier to grasp. Joshua is more complex and subtle."

It took four years to complete Joshua from conception to finish. It cost $10 million to make, compared to $800,000 for Duddy.

Reinhold Kramer, Richler's biographer, says that major studios in Hollywood declined Richler's script. However, up-and-coming Canadian producer Robert Lantos and his partner, Stephen Roth, were interested.

Kotcheff, a Torontonian who launched his career at the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, was already a well-known figure in the film industry when he came on board, having directed Life at the Top, Fun with Dick and Jane, North Dallas Forty and First Blood (with Sylvester Stallone).

By then, Kotcheff's fee per film had risen to $1 million, but in deference to Richler he agreed to charge half price and take a percentage of the profits, Kramer says.

"I took some cash deferments," Kotcheff said.

With the project firmly on track, Kotcheff started casting. He chose James Wood as Joshua, Alan Arkin as his father Reuben and Gabrielle Lazure – the daughter of a former Quebec cabinet minister – as Pauline, Joshua's wife.

Looking back, Kotcheff has high praise for Arkin and Woods.

Arkin was "amazing" as a fast-talking petty gangster who liberally quotes from the Bible, while Woods managed to capture Richler's caustic wit.

Originally, Kotcheff hoped to cast Hollywood actress Cybill Shepherd as Pauline. But since some of the financing was provided by the federal government, Kotcheff had to abide by Canadian content rules and could hire only one non-Canadian actor.

"I wanted Cybill for the part and she wanted to do it, so I had to choose between her and Arkin."

Lazure, in her inaugural English-language role, turned out to be a problematic choice. According to Kramer, she lacked strong acting skills and a WASP accent. As a result, Kotcheff had to dub her voice and cut down her scenes.

Kotcheff claims that her "visual performance" was excellent but acknowledges that her voice was high pitched.

Joshua Then and Now was shot on location in Montreal, London, Brockville and Ottawa starting in the summer of 1984. Thanks to the intervention of a federal cabinet minister, John Roberts, Kotcheff was granted permission to shoot scenes in the Canadian Senate.

Ted Kotcheff

Although he leaves it up to viewers to judge whether Joshua Then and Now has held up reasonably well after 25 years, Kotcheff likes two scenes in particular.

The first one, which unfolds in the opening minutes, is a flashback to Montreal's Jewish quarter in the 1940s. "I'm pleased the way we recreated this era," he said.

Kotcheff is also fond of a tender scene in which Joshua and Pauline were reunited after a falling out.

As in the past, Kotcheff was granted final cut, which means he had the last word on content.

Lantos made suggestions, but immediately backed off when Kotcheff disagreed. "I would never have done anything to compromise the integrity of the film. Richler was my best friend."

Kotcheff, a Bulgarian Canadian whose parents arrived in Canada as immigrants in the late 1920s, met Richler in 1956 in southern France.

Later, in London, they shared a room for three years.

"We liked each other tremendously, though we were different," said Kotcheff, who was born in Cabbagetown in Toronto. "He saw me as a reflection of himself. He wanted to be the greatest Canadian writer, I wanted to be the greatest Canadian filmmaker."

He added, "I knew him for 44 years."

Kotcheff said he was considered for the newest Richler film, Barney's Version, which was produced by Lantos, directed by Richard Lewis, and is scheduled to be released this year.

"But I didn't push it," he said.

As he recalls, he and Richler talked about filming St. Urbain's Horseman. Kotcheff convinced George Segal to play the lead role, but the project fell through when financing did not pan out.

Nonetheless, he would like nothing more than to make another film based on a novel by Richler.

Israeli sitcom Srugim is enormously appealing

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The newest sensation on Israeli TV, Srugim, is a transplanted Hebraic version of the American sitcom Friends.

Srugim, directed by Eliezer Shapiro, revolves around a group of five 30-something religious men and women in Jerusalem.

All of them are single and all of them seek love, marriage and personal fulfillment.

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival's Chai Tea and A Movie series is screening the first three episodes on Feb. 21 at 5 p.m. at Silver City, Richmond Hill.

Three more episodes will be screened on Feb. 28 at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre cinemas at 5 p.m.

A hit among religious and secular Israelis, Srugim takes its name from the crocheted yarmulkes favoured by men from the national/religious camp.

The characters in Srugim are observant but not fanatic. They observe basic rituals but are not disconnected from mainstream society.

Yifat (Yael Sharoni), a graphic artist, shares an apartment with Hodaya (Tali Sharon), a university student specializing in biblical studies.

Their friend, Reut (Sharon Fauster), is an economist who holds down a lucrative job.

The males in the mix are Natti (Ohad Knoller), a surgical intern, and Amir (Amos Tamam), a divorced teacher working at a girls' religious school.

Yifat meets Natti at a speed dating session. He's cool and aloof, but she's impressed by his status as a doctor. She invites him to a Sabbath meal, but much to her annoyance, Natti gravitates toward Hodaya.

Meanwhile, Reut and Micha, a rising executive, break up after five months of dating. His half-hearted marriage proposal leaves her cold.

The plot thickens when Amir and Reut hook up, if only platonically, and when Hodaya finally melts in the presence of an archeologist at the Hebrew University.

Judging by the first three installments, Srugim is fun, edgy and, all together, enormously appealing.

The situations are real. The colloquial dialogue is snappy, sassy and smart. The acting is naturalistic. The cinematography reveals Jerusalem as a city on a hill blessed by its surroundings.

In short, Srugim is a winner.

Argentine composer at Jane Mallet Theatre

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts editor

Soundstreams Canada is presenting Argentine Jewish composer Osvaldo Golijov, along with composer Jose Evangelista and soprano Dawn Upshaw in the Ashes in the Wind program on Feb. 24 at 8 p.m. at the Jane Mallett Theatre, Toronto.

Golijov's parents were Romanian Jews who escaped the Holocaust and immigrated to Argentina.

Many of his works, especially those from the early 1990s, are shaped and informed by his Jewish identity in the aftermath of the Holocaust. His music is heavily influenced by klezmer, Sephardi and Yiddish lullaby among many other Jewish and Latin traditions. He's a recipient of the MacArthur "Genius Grant" Fellowship and the Vilcek Prize and two 2006 Grammy Awards. He composed scores for Francis Ford Coppola's Youth without Youth and the recently released Tetro.

He composed several pieces for soprano Upshaw including Three Songs for Soprano and Orchestra, and the opera Ainadamar.

Golijov's works start and end the program which will feature his 1994 composition K'vakarat from The Dreams & Prayers of Isaac the Blind. Golijov once called the composition "an epic history of Judaism."

Golijov will be present and will be introduced by Soundstream's artistic director Lawrence Cherney.

The concert is presented in collaboration with the University of Toronto and the Toronto Symphony Orchestra's New Creations Festival which runs Feb. 22 to March 3, of which Golijov is the featured composer.

Tickets for Ashes in the Wind are $40 ($15 for students, $25 for seniors) and are available through the St. Lawrence Centre Box Office at 416-366-7723 or www.stlc.com

Soundstreams is also presenting Osvaldo Golijov's World on Feb. 22 at 7:30 p.m. at the Gardiner Museum. A meet and greet with Golijov begins at 7 p.m.

THE "EXPLOSIVE, PROVOCATIVE" PLAY TALK COMING IN MARCH COURTESY OF HAROLD GREEN THEATRE COMPANY

Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company presents the Toronto première of Talk, the play by Michael Nathanson that the Winnipeg Free Press called "explosive" and "provocative." An engrossing examination of both the power of language and the true nature of friendship, Talk is a funny, complex and touching look at a relationship torn apart by clashing views.

A finalist for the 2009 Governor General's Literary Award for drama, Talk features actors Kevin Bunday and Michael Rubenfeld, who recreates his role from the original Winnipeg production. The director is Ted Dykstra. Tickets $20 to $69. St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts, March 3 to 20. 416-366-7723. www.stlc.co

Comedy monologue explores weight, dieting and self-esteem

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Monica Parker describes her one-woman, comedic monologue Sex, Pies and a Few White Lies, as the story of every woman's love-hate relationship with dieting and about learning to love one's own body.

The Glasgow-born actress, writer and producer calls her show, playing in Stouffville, Ont., and Toronto this month, a "one woman and a half," mostly true story, and says her message is that everybody should stop worrying and being neurotic about losing weight.

"I think humour is a weapon and a medication," she says. "Humour allows you to be 100 per cent honest. Humour makes things palatable that are not palatable if you don't have a sense of humour."

She says the show is about love and losses; loss of meaning, weight, parental loss, loss of identity and self-esteem. She says it has taken 101 humiliations to become who she is now.

Parker got her start in Toronto in 1972 on Sweet City Woman, a show she wrote, produced and starred in for Citytv, which was in its early days then. "Ivan Reitman was the director. I wore a leotard and I was the big, fat blond with long hair, and it was the first time I got affirmations for being big," she says.

Monica Parker

"It was also the first time that I understood the validation of putting it out there. What I have really understood on this long road of being a big woman is it doesn't matter how many diets you go on, and I've been on every single one of them, ultimately you have to make peace with what you are."

Parker left Toronto and spent 25 years in sunny Los Angeles. She and her husband, fashion designer Gilles Savard, returned to Toronto two years ago to be close to family. Not used to the cold of winter, she hibernated and started writing Sex, Pies and a Few White Lies, her first theatrical show in 20 years.

Parker says she had talked about writing a one-person show at dinner tables for years. "In a way it's cathartic, it's entertainment. I have had amazing encouragement from friends. The genesis for this show is, I've battled my weight my whole life. There is a line in my show, 'I was born at 6-1/2 pounds and an hour later I was 62 pounds,'"she says, chuckling.

Although she doesn't advocate that people be overweight, she said that after yo-yo dieting for a time, she made a conscious decision that she was going to live large and healthy – mentally, emotionally and physically. She's an avid walker and does yoga.

While living in Hollywood, Parker acted in numerous TV shows, including Nancy Drew, A Perfect Murder, ER, The X-Files, Murder She Wrote and Knots Landing. Her writing and producing credits include All Dogs Go to Heaven, Who's the Boss, A Kiss So Deadly, Hunger Point, Home by Christmas, and The Party Never Stops.

When Parker's mother immigrated to Scotland from the Austro-Hungarian Empire sometime before World War II, her much older half-brother and half-sister remained until their mother could get settled. Caught by the escalation of the war, her brother survived three years in Auschwitz. Miraculously, all were reunited in Scotland after the war.

"I am a secular Jew, [daughter] of people that have gone through the war and either have embraced their Judaism and God, or they pushed away from it," Parker says. " My mother pushed away from it, and my father wasn't Jewish. I was raised Jewish because that is the community I lived in. Cultural Jewishness is huge in my life, I identify Jewish... I have a Jewish mouth, meaning you think and you don't hold back, and I'm proud of that," she says

Directed by Pam Brighton, Sex, Pies and a Few White Lies runs in Stouffville at the Lebovic Centre, (www.townofws.com/nineteen) from Feb. 17 to 20, and at Toronto's Pilot Tavern's Stealth Lounge, 22 Cumberland St., from Feb. 22 to 24. Tickets to the show at the Pilot are available by e-mailing blackwellcommunications@gmail.com or at the door.

Prodigy puts piano first

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Coral Solomon is in love.

With her piano.

Solomon, 16, is a musical prodigy. She won first place at the 2008 Toronto Sinfonietta Concerto Competition, performed at Isabel Bader Theatre in Toronto with the Sinfonietta and will be performing an hour-long solo concert in Israel later this winter.

"I really enjoy playing," she said. "You obviously practise, but when you play, it's kind of like singing. It just comes out."

Solomon has been playing the piano since she was seven, but was exposed to it long before then, her mother, Lena, said.

"She started hearing music, I think since I was pregnant with her," she said. "I would play [the piano] to her when she was inside, hoping that she will get to love it."

And she has.

Rather than shop with friends and flip through TV channels, Solomon spends her free time practising. And practising and practising.

She plays around three hours a day, sometimes more if she can get in a half-hour before school.

"I put piano first," she said. "School is a tight second, and friends come at the end. It's really hard to accommodate school. I do get behind."

Solomon is a Grade 11 student at Earl Haig Secondary School's Claude Watson arts program. While her mother first started teaching her to play the piano, Solomon, who was born in Israel, began taking formal lessons when she was eight years old. When she immigrated to Canada with her family at the age of 11, she was accepted into the Royal Conservatory of Music's Young Artist Performers Academy, where she's now at the senior level.

For Solomon's father, Emil, it was clear early on that his daughter had a connection with the piano.

"We've been told by a lot of people that she has a special musicality... [and] a great talent which is maybe bigger than others," he said. "She's feeling the music in a very special way."

But piano hasn't always been Solomon's only passion. When she started high school, the pianist wanted to be an aerospace engineer.

"Originally, at the beginning of high school, I wanted to go into aeronautics engineering. That was my dream," she said.

This dream changed in Grade 11. Now, Solomon is determined to become a professional pianist.

"I really like playing the piano. I think I do have the chance and the future [to play professionally]," she said.

Book's message still resonates with today's readers

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Nancy-Gay Rotstein's Shattering Glass has been recently released in a new Canadian edition by Overlook Press. Published 14 years ago, the novel addresses a timely issue faced by three women striving for success in their professional and personal lives.

"I believe it's one of the most pressing and unresolved issues facing families," said Rotstein recently from her Toronto home. "How to get a fulfilling balance between career and family life is a problem that's even more critical today because of the current environment of financial instability. The issues that the book raises are even more intensely felt by families because of the financial downturn of the economy."

Nancy Gay Rotstein

In her well-crafted novel, Rotstein creates three distinct characters – Judy, Dede and Barbara – but the common thread weaving them together is their pursuit of happiness and success.

"We each have our own personal glass ceiling when we accomplish the goals we set for ourselves in our career and jobs. My book deals with what happens when we achieve it," Rotstein said.

"Women shatter glass ceilings to become successful in their careers. Complications arise in our personal life that can shatter our happiness, and this book is about three women who struggle to achieve independence and what happens after they shatter the glass. It's about all the things we weren't warned would happen."

Rotstein, who has a law degree and mediation practice, wrote Shattering Glass from her personal experience and research, in order to make each woman's story one that readers can relate to. The women's stories are enhanced by Rotstein's use of vivid imagery and expressive language.

"For me, the novel seemed the best vehicle for exploring real-life situations in a way that would have the greatest emotional impact and provide an entertaining provocative read," said Rotstein, who is married and has three adult children.

Shattering Glass empowers readers with its message. "Although these women face very different life situations, they are very much alike because ultimately each woman achieves happiness and success by discovering and by relying on the strength within herself," Rotstein said.

Through her website (www.nancygayrotstein.ca), Rotstein receives feedback from readers wondering how she could have known their stories. "It's so gratifying to hear that. People are asking what happens to the characters after – they are very involved in the story and want it to continue. I'm constantly writing, so who knows, there may be another one," she said.

The novel's universal theme has been embraced by readers in diverse countries, including Poland, Russia, Czech Republic, Norway, Denmark, Sweden and Australia, and it has been translated into eight languages.

Rotstein is also a poet. Her poetry collections include China: Shockwaves and This Horizon and Beyond: Poems Selected and New, for which the Canadian poet Irving Layton wrote the foreword.

Last year, to commemorate the third anniversary of Layton's death, Rotstein's tribute poem, Eyeing the Shark: Irving Layton at Maimonides Geriatric Centre, was published in the Globe and Mail, and in April, during poetry month, it appeared on the Globe's website.

Rotstein stays connected to the arts by writing, as she continually explores the world around her.

Teen pianist will perform in Israel

Gennady Gefter, one of Solomon's music teachers at Earl Haig, agrees.

"She's a good pianist. She's far above the average level. She's very musical," he said. "She loves music all together… she's very comfortable with stage performance and has a very strong stage presence."

Solomon will perform in Israel, in March 17, at the Open University of Israel in Tel Aviv, the next step in her musical career.

Solomon was invited to play at the university after her parents sent a recording of their daughter to the school.

She will be playing for a full hour, with no intermission. This isn't anything new to the teen.

"[It's] very hard to continuously play for an hour… You have to physically have enough endurance. Mentally, you have to stay focused until the end," she said.

"You get so carried away with the excitement, you [don't] feel like it was an hour. You just feel exhausted. If you played well, then it's a good kind of exhausted."

Solomon, whose favourite composers include Mozart and Liszt, has begun composing her own music. For the musician, writing music is about bursts of inspiration.

"I randomly get glimpses of whatever ideas. I go on the piano. I try to play around. I improvise. I try to collect [ideas] together… once I get that, I write it down," she said.

While the musician has played the cello and clarinet, her favourite instrument is the piano.

"It depends on your personal feel for it. [The piano] feels right," she said.

Canadians bring medicine to Cuban Jews

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

HAVANA — A group of 20 Canadian Jews travelled to Havana recently to assist Cuba's small and relatively isolated Jewish community of about 1,500 people.

The Canadians were part of a first-ever UIA Federations Canada's Young Leadership tikkun olam mission to Cuba, Jan 26 to 31.

"We arrived in Cuba bringing duffel bags full of donations of medicines, as well as toothbrushes, soap, disposable diapers, and other essential items that are needed by Jews in Cuba," Mindy Eklove, director of National Young Leadership of UIA Federations Canada, said.

The Cuban Jewish community gives out medicine to members of the Jewish community in need weekly.

"We are very grateful for what the Canadians brought," William Miller, vice-president of the Cuban Jewish community, told The CJN.

Mission participants also helped divide and bag portions of powdered milk they purchased for the Cuban Jewish community. Powdered-milk rations in Cuba are only given out to children under eight.

"There is no fresh milk in Cuba, so there are many members of our community, especially those with babies and children, who rely on powdered milk," Miller said.

Prior to 1959, when Fidel Castro came into power, there was an active Jewish community of some 15,000 Jews in Havana alone, many of whose ancestors originated from Europe and Turkey. After Castro nationalized private business and property, 90 per cent of the Jewish population, many of them business owners, left the island. The remaining 10 per cent were generally not observant Jews, and over the years, many intermarried.

Jewish communal life continued to decline until 1992, after the fall of the Soviet Union, when Cuba changed its constitution, allowing for religious freedom.

Adela Dworkin, president of the Cuban Jewish community, told The CJN that most Cuban Jews have one child.

"In some ways I feel that it is a miracle that we have survived. For years, we didn't have enough Jewish people coming to pray in our synagogues," she said. "We would have a 'Cuban minyan,' made up of eight adults, and then we'd count the Torah, and God, to make the necessary 10."

Miller said that today, there are about 60 Cuban Jews a year "who make aliyah to Israel," but in "2010 there were 100 Cubans who married Jews and underwent Conservative conversions."

Dworkin told The CJN about her meeting with Castro in 1998.

"I asked him why he had never visited the Jewish community, and he answered, 'because I was never invited,'" she said.

Dworkin then invited him to an upcoming Chanukah celebration at El Patronato, the Jewish community centre, housed in the same building as Beth Shalom synagogue, a Conservative shul.

When Castro asked what Chanukah is, Dworkin replied, "The holiday celebrates a revolution," a word he likes. To Dworkin's surprise, he came to the party and addressed the congregation in a lengthy speech.

Participants of the mission were welcomed by many spirited young adults at El Patronato. The young Cuban Jews, many of whom have travelled to Israel on Birthright/Taglit programs, sang and danced in Hebrew, waving Israeli and Cuban flags.

"The Cuban government has granted travel visas to anyone who has applied to go on these programs," Dworkin said.

Shawna Goodman, campaign chair for Montreal's Federations CJA's Young Leadership Campaign, told The CJN that "we need to educate other Canadian Jews who travel to Cuba to take an extra day and visit the community in Havana and to pack a bag of needed medicines, shampoo, etc.

"The Cuban Jews cannot be forgotten… the highest form of tzedakah is to give them the tools to help themselves. They are the best investment ever and we have so much to learn from them."

Participants of a UIA Federations Canada's Young Leadership tikkun olam mission to Cuba gather in a restored part of old Havana.

Jewish biathlete bringing passion for success to Vancouver

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

When the call from Germany arrived at the Spector family home in Lenox, Mass., last month, the voice on the other end betrayed little of the excitement one would expect from a newly minted Olympian.

Laura Spector, 22, had qualified for the U.S. Olympic biathlon team that is competing in Vancouver.

"It was a very quiet voice, and it was just, 'Daddy, Hi it's Laura. I made the team,'" her father, Jesse, recalled. "It was just like that. It was that quiet, from this 5-foot, 100-pound kid. It was probably a very emotional three to five seconds because her voice sounded as though, 'Dad, I didn't make the team.' But she was so composed. It had its own – I don't know – moment is the only way I can put it."

Spector is the youngest American woman vying in the biathlon, which combines cross-country skiing with target shooting. She is also one of five athletes measuring in at 5-feet tall – the shortest members of the 2010 U.S. Olympic team.

A student of genetics and Jewish studies at Dartmouth College, Spector is among a handful of Jewish Olympians headed to Vancouver for the 21st Winter Olympics.

Chicago native Ben Agosto, a 2006 Olympic silver medalist, is returning to compete in the ice-dancing pairs. Steve Mesler, a bobsledder from Buffalo, N.Y., is back for his third Olympics.

Israel will field a team of three in Vancouver: Mikail Renzhin, an alpine skier originally from Latvia, and the brother-sister duo Alexandra and Roman Zaretsky, born in Belarus, who compete in ice dancing.

Agosto, 28, who nearly missed the 2006 Olympics because his partner, the Canadian-born skater Tanith Belbin, was not yet a naturalized American citizen, said he was looking forward to soaking in the atmosphere of what will almost certainly be his last Olympics. A last-minute act of Congress granted Belbin expedited citizenship and she was able to represent the United States at the Games in Turin, Italy.

"When that came through it was really a big surprise, but we really didn't have that time to build up and kind of think of what to expect," Agosto told JTA by phone from his training rink in Pennsylvania. "We were just kind of thrown into it. There's a lot that I don't remember because it was such a whirlwind."

Spector grew up on a farm in Lenox where her family keeps llamas, alpacas, goats, horses, sheep, turkeys and chickens. She does her academic work during the spring and summer to free up the fall and winter for training and competition.

In high school she would wake before the sun to make tracks on her skis in a field behind the family home. She discovered biathlon at a camp for the sport in Lake Placid, N.Y., when she was 14.

"It was my first experience with shooting a gun, but I loved combining two sports -- cross-country skiing (in this case running because it was summer time) and marksmanship – to make each a little more challenging," Spector wrote in an e-mail. "Therefore, the greater the reward when you do well."

Her parents describe her as an unusually precocious and passionate kid who, from a young age, was adept at meeting challenges.

"She's not a frivolous kid," said Spector's mother, Patty, herself a national champion in marathon canoe racing. "Even when she's on the road and travelling, she reads books that most people her age would never go near or pick up. She just finished The Gulag Archipelago. "

When she became a bat mitzvah at the Conservative Congregation Knesset Israel Synagogue in nearby Pittsfield, where her family has been members for 30 years, Spector conducted the entire Shabbat service in keeping with the synagogue's tradition of lay-led services. Spector also attended the synagogue's Hebrew school.

"For me, being Jewish is a lot about family and community, and the continuity of tradition," Spector said. "There is an entire congregation at home responsible for the shaping of my religious and cultural identity. There is comfort in knowing that these are people who have known me since I was born and have instilled in me thousands of years of tradiution in ethical behavior."

Israeli wows New York crowd

JTA

NEW YORK — The first Israeli player in the NBA received boisterous support at Madison Square Garden.

Omri Casspi, who is having a strong rookie season for the Sacramento Kings, heard loud cheers and chants on what was billed as Jewish Heritage Night.

Casspi, playing 45 minutes, contributed 18 points and 9 rebounds as the Kings rallied for a 118-114 overtime victory.

"This is not a regular game for me and it was important for me to start strong... show the coach and everybody that I am here to play and focus on basketball," Casspi said in reports.

Several hours before the game, the Israeli Consulate in New York hosted a reception for Casspi, a first-round draft pick.

At a question-and-answer session and shootaround before the game, Casspi reportedly said that the Kings' players look out for him.

Casspi was chosen to play in the Rookie Challenge against the top second-year players during All-Star Weekend. He is averaging 12 points and 5 rebounds per game.

Euro 2012 draw made

Compiled by CJN Staff

Israel has drawn a relatively easy qualifying group for soccer's Euro 2012 tournament.

Israel was drawn in Group 6 against Croatia, Greece, Latvia, Georgia and Malta. They do not have to play against Europe's cream of the crop that includes Germany, Italy, Spain and England.

Now all Israel needs is a coach. The fact that Israel stands a decent chance of qualifying may help them lure a quality coach.

Israel plays a friendly against Romania in two weeks, and the Israel Football Association hopes to have a coach in place by then.

Helping needy is 'real eye-opener' for teen

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Daniel Navy, 17, has combined his strong muscles with his kind heart in order to give people in need an emotional lift.

The son of Jewish Women International of Canada's national office secretary Miriam Navy, Daniel offered his help after learning about a predicament that the organization had found itself in.

Penny Krowitz, JWI/C executive director, explained that at JWI/C, they know of a lot of people who could use furniture, and they also know a lot of people who have furniture to donate.

Project gives people in need an emotional lift

"The problem, however, is connecting these people. We need trucks, a warehouse and strong men. It is a huge undertaking, and it hurts me deeply when we can't help."

Their policy, she said, is to accept only brand-new furniture for ASTEH (Alternate Short-Term Emergency Housing), their apartment for abused women, which they co-sponsor with Jewish Family and Child. "The community has been very generous, but we have no storage or pickup ability."

They chose to step aside from their policy, Krowitz said, when they learned that ASTEH's television was not working. "We knew that a lot of people were upgrading their televisions, even though their old televisions were in good shape. Miriam sent out an e-mail to Toronto members, and within five minutes, she had 12 responses. We were overwhelmed."

She said that one of the responses was from a former resident of the shelter who was prepared to give up her own TV because she knew how important television is to the residents.

"This is when Daniel offered to pick up a television and set it up in the ASTEH apartment. We then called Jewish Family and Child and asked them if they had clients who could use the 11 other televisions. We made the 'shidduchs,' and Miriam and Daniel offered to be the delivery people."

Miriam Navy said that the whole process has been "a real eye-opener for Daniel. We drove downtown, and he saw people at the other end of the spectrum. A lot of people in the community live in a bubble. They don't realize that not all Jews live in ideal circumstances."

"We spoke to Daniel about the need for discretion and the importance of maintaining the people's dignity, and he did his work quietly and [respectfully]," Navy said.

Krowitz said that the project "just happened. We hadn't planned it, and it is not ongoing.

"It made our hearts feel good. The recipients were appreciative, and the social worker said it it was a mitzvah."

About Life

I received this letter last week from a little girl in Grade 3.

Dear Ella,

There is a girl named Ashley at school. She bullies me all the time. She also bullies my friends. I don't know what to do. She makes me cry all the time. I told my teacher but she said, "You guys can handle your own problems." I also asked my parents, but they say, "Tell the teacher and stand up for yourself," but it doesn't work. How can I make someone stop bullying?

Being Bullied

Dear Being Bullied

A bully tries to gain control by making other kids feel sad or afraid. It makes Ashley feel powerful to bully you. It's a way for her to cover up her own insecurities.

There are things you can try to do to stop her. You must stand up to her. You could start by ignoring her behaviour, but that's not always possible. If you can't just walk away, try letting her say whatever she wants while you just listen quietly. When she's finished, in a very calm voice say, "Are you finished now?" then walk away with no emotion. No laughing, no crying, no yelling, just like you couldn't care less. I know this is very hard to do, but if she sees her bullying isn't having an effect on you, she will move on to someone else. You may not be able to change Ashley's bullying behaviour, but you can try to change how you react to it.

But you shouldn't be dealing with this alone. Your teacher needs to help you solve this problem.

For parents: Bullying is a form of repeated aggression used to create the illusion of power. It can be physical, verbal or social. Ontario's Education Amendment Act, Keeping Our Kids Safe at School, amends the section of the Education Act dealing with behaviour, discipline and safety, effective Feb. 1, 2010. Here is an excerpt:

"Board employees who work directly with students are required to respond to incidents that may have a negative impact on the school climate. The goal of the policy is to support a safe learning and teaching environment in which every student can reach his or her full potential." You can read it in more detail at http://www.edu.gov.on.ca/extra/eng/ppm/145.pdf.

Kids should never feel alone at school, and now this amendment eliminates the option for teachers to say, "You guys can handle your own problems."

Acting 'as if' can make it real

Acting "as if" is a powerful coaching tool I often suggest to clients.

"If you want a quality, act as if you already have it," philosopher William James said.

Before Barack Obama was president of the United States, he acted as if he already was. He signed letters as the president of the United States, he visualized and stepped into the role, acting as if he were president before he was actually living and working in the White House.

Life Coach Corner

By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

This has long been a coaching tool used in method acting – you imagine how the character would speak, walk, talk and dress, and then act as if you were that person.

I'll never forget when I used to work as a producer on a national television show. It was a frenetic environment with incredibly high stress levels, as each producer was required to produce a national television show weekly.

As a senior producer, I worked with an associate producer who was very relaxed and calm. When everyone was racing around looking for guests and experts, she would calmly come over to my desk and ask in a pleasant, slow and relaxed voice, "What seems to be the problem?"

I would listen to her speak on the telephone in a calm monotone, and noticed that when I got on the phone, I would start to emulate her style. It was fabulous. I got better guests, and whenever things got heated, I would step into her shoes, talk the way she talked, and feel immediately relaxed.

I often suggest to clients that if they want to feel more confident, calmer, happier, more free, more organized, or whatever they are searching for, they should step into the shoes of someone who is already like that. So, if being calmer is something you aspire to, imagine a friend or relative, or even a celebrity who appears to be really calm. Then when you are in a difficult situation, imagine how this person would react, what they would say, how their tone of voice would convey what they want it to, and imagine stepping into their shoes.

Author Wayne Dyer talks about the concept of acting "as if" in his book Real Magic, Creating Miracles in Everyday Life. "The more you see yourself as what you'd like to become, and act as if what you want is already there, the more you'll activate those dormant forces that will collaborate to transform your dreams into your reality," he writes.

So, do you want to lose that 20 pounds once and for all, clear out the clutter and be done with it, achieve something you have always wanted to do and dreamed of but never done? Acting "as if" is a perfect place to start. Don't reinvent the wheel. If you want to be like Barbara Walters, read everything about her. Where did she start? What were the steps she took to become one of the best-known and most beloved television interviewers in the world?

Acting "as if" can make many of your goals and dreams come to life, and acting the way you want to feel can transform your mood, your outlook and your disposition in a very happy way. And, of course, the greatest part of all of this is that when you really act "as if," soon you will not be acting anymore and you will become or have that very thing you wished for all along!

The honeymoon: the first draft of your life together

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

Wedding albums are a one-way ticket in time travel. Open one and instantly, the decade, if not the year, reveals itself: bride wearing peau de soie? Sideburned ushers in pastel blue tuxes? Jello moulds headlining the sweet table? What screams 1964 like women with helmet hair?

But one thing that doesn't go out of style is a honeymoon—often to a place that's sunny and sandy. Beaches are the perfect metaphor for a good marriage: warm and nurturing, with waters occasionally ruffled but mostly calm.

Two regrets about my wedding, or shall we say, its aftermath: the photographer never did put my bridal portrait in his front window. Maybe some faces aren't so good for business.

Dorothy Lipovenko and her husband, Henry Mietkiewicz.

The other regret, more sentiment than vanity: not having a honeymoon.

Married on a Wednesday, back at work Monday, with two nights ticking on the Sheva Brachot meter. Translated as "seven blessings" (initially recited under the chupah), the Sheva Brachot prayers are also a reason for a week of lively post-wedding meals – usually dinner – hosted by family and friends for the new couple.

The upside? Your bridal gown may be packed away, but you still feel a little "on" with the attendant fuss. The downside? Returning home nightly like two beached whales from all that food.

Sheva Brachot celebration is a nice tradition, a clever but subtle way of easing a young couple's transition from parental home to marital home. They didn't know from honeymoons (or much privacy) in the shtetl, and besides, one can honeymoon later, right?

Indeed, we did plan a trip, a scenic drive to the Poconos, but work got in the way. Disappointment was rationalized with "God must have wanted to keep us off the I-95 for a reason." We still cling to that, 34 years later.

But it bothers me, from time to time, my honeymoonless union. True, there have been numerous trips to the beach, but that's when we needed "down time" from the business of living. Decompressing is not the same as taking your first baby steps in the sand as a married couple.

When did honeymoons start? The scenic getaway is fairly new, about 150 years or so, as travel broadened. The possible origins of the word "honeymoon" are varied, dating back several centuries, but the consensus is that a supply of mead, or honey wine, was given to the bride and groom to drink during their first month together. Oy, that's one alcoholic buzz!

Fast-forward to the present, when even the modern honeymoon is not immune to a makeover.

Take, for example, writer-editor Joshua Berman of Boulder, Colo. He and his wife, Tay, spent half of their 16-month overseas honeymoon as volunteers on a Peace Corps-style program run by American Jewish World Service (AJWS).

In an e-mail, Joshua says he and Tay, a registered nurse who married in 2004, were the only newlyweds (during their stint) on the New York-based program that places young Jewish volunteers in developing countries to provide skills and training.

After a three-month assignment in India that included working with tea workers' families, (and celebrating Rosh Hashanah during monsoon season), the Bermans were so keen they continued on to Sri Lanka and Ghana for AJWS.

Closer to home, Rabbi Wayne Dosick of San Diego and his wife, Ellen, ventured to a most unusual destination while honeymooning in Chicago, their mutual birthplace and hometown.

In an article published recently in the Chicago Jewish News, Rabbi Dosick describes this return to their roots as "couple's archeology," introducing "each other to the people and places that held history and meaning for us." That they did, including the shul they'd both davened in, old schools, a favourite park and museum, even their childhood homes that, at one point, had been on the same block. (The two had not known each other in Chicago).

But the journey really stepped back in time with their visit to the cemetery where, Rabbi Dosick writes, "we met the generations… those whose lives formed the foundations of our own." Moving from headstone to headstone, they told each other stories about those respective family members.

Such honeymoon experiences are inspiring. Uplifting. What a wonderful opportunity to lay major groundwork for what a couple wants to accomplish, to define what's important to both. Perhaps the value of this post-nuptial time lies less in its allure as a sunwashed paradise than a chance to write a first draft of your history together, in the real world.

Brides

At last I am a mother-in-law

By BEV BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

In dictionaries, the term "mother-in-law" is defined as mother of the bride or groom. She is often painted as the bane of the otherwise blissful existence of a married couple – or the saviour of it. But, regardless of any definition, I couldn't wait for the day I would become one.

Of my three grown children, my son Zev was the first to marry. All of the experiences at this joyous time in our lives were firsts for my husband and me: the nervous yet excited feelings we shared the evening our son brought home our future daughter-in-law for the first time, the butterflies in our stomachs the night we met our future machatonim, the engagement party, the shower – but the most meaningful of all was standing beside our son under the chupah.

In my case, I found the proverbial pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. Michelle, our son's intended, couldn't be lovelier. Her parents and sister couldn't be warmer or more enveloping. Our family and theirs bonded immediately. As we left their house that first evening, we could hear them shouting, "Thank God," because it was all good!

Leading up to the wedding, Michelle was incredibly thoughtful and inclusive. She wanted both her mother and me to share each and every stage of the planning of the wedding. I offered my vote on her final choice of bridal gown, she welcomed my opinion on her choice of wedding planner, décor company, invitations. If she was ever stressed about the minutiae of planning such an event, it certainly didn't show.

Zev, on the other hand, was a groomzilla! So, with some motherly advice from me, Michelle came to understand that less was more when involving him with the smaller details. She cleverly got the job done in a way that allowed him to think he was making as many decisions as she did.

The real excitement began when the RSVPs started arriving – we received "will attend" responses from as far away as Poland, Israel, Calgary, Saskatchewan, Texas and New York. Dinner parties were arranged, tours of the city were organized, and of course, Niagara Falls was on the agenda.

The hustle and bustle of the wedding day arrived. Hair, makeup, manicure-pedicure appointments unfolded on schedule. Suddenly, we were at The Venetian Banquet Centre, all dressed up for the wedding. For a second, I was overwhelmed by how everything had come together and how very beautiful everything was. I took a moment to soak up the perfection of the room where the ceremony would take place and then the stunning ballroom – both were prepared beyond any of my expectations, and I felt so proud.

When the bride and groom arrived in a limousine after having their formal portraits taken elsewhere, my eyes filled with the first tears of joy. They were extraordinary to me – they were such a stunning couple, glowing with happiness and serenity. They were the king and queen of the day.

Although Michelle did not have an Orthodox upbringing as Zev did, she and her family were happy to include Orthodox traditions in the wedding. At the kabbalat panim – the welcoming reception for the bride – Michelle, her mom, her sister, my daughters and I were joined by all of the women who attended. It was so much fun to share this with my closest girlfriends, as they had all seen Zev grow up and were proud of me for "letting him live to see this day." He wasn't always the easiest teenager to deal with!

The men were otherwise occupied at the chossen's tisch (groom's table), where the details of the marriage licence were gone over and signed, and where they had the opportunity to raise a glass to wish l'chaim to Zev and Michelle.

At the appointed time, Zev was escorted to Michelle by my husband and Michelle's dad and the rest of the men while they sang Simen Tov and Mazel Tov. Based on custom dating back to the days of Jacob, Zev brought the veil down over Michelle's face in preparedness for his marriage to her. I cried!

While standing in line waiting for the planner to tell us when to begin the march down the aisle, we teased Michelle and Zev that they still had time to change their minds. Michelle emphatically said, "No way."

The music started, and the first to march, my mother-in-law and brother-in-law, disappeared through the door. Suddenly, it was time for my husband and me to walk half-way down and wait to escort Zev to the chupah. Our son had become a man. What an incredibly happy moment that was for us!

We were thrilled at the peaceful and loving look on Zev's face as he turned to see his beautiful bride walk toward him on the arms of her parents. The rabbi conducted the service with warmth and much humour, and suddenly it was there – the sound I had waited to hear all my life – the stomping on the glass and the shouts of mazel tov, as my son became a husband. And I became a mother-in-law!

The rest of the simchah unfolded into an evening of unbelievable fun – the music was incredible, the food was beyond incredible, the ambiance in the ballroom was elegant yet relaxed. Everyone had such a good time. My feet were killing me! I don't know what we would have done without our wedding planner. She took care of every last detail and ran around all evening to make sure that everything worked out perfectly. I am still tempted to present her with a pair of gold-plated roller blades as her Award of Achievement for being in 10 places at once!

I had been warned by so many to try my best to enjoy every minute of the wedding, as it would simply fly by. I did try to put things into slow motion, but the evening still went by far too quickly.

Now as a seasoned in-law of three months, I can honestly say that my life has been enriched in more ways than I can count. The young couple brings happiness to us whenever they are with us. They are loving and happy, and they are building a house. The next stage of their lives is unfolding and, with God's blessings, they will fill their four-bedroom home with children and I will become the most blessed of all women – a grandmother!

'Honeymoon for humanity' opened our eyes

By MICHAEL ETTEDGUI
Special to The CJN

The following is a story of learning, adventure and giving. We were married on June 21, 2009, and travelled to Kenya shortly thereafter on what we like to call our "honeymoon for humanity."

Our engagement lasted about nine months, which was just about long enough for Sherri to convince me to spend our honeymoon in one the world's most underdeveloped countries. Sherri couldn't think of a better way to start our married life together than volunteering in Nairobi.

I, on the other hand, was looking forward to white sandy beaches and tropical juices by the pool. So we got to work, trying to combine her desire for substance with my longing for the exact opposite.

Sherri with a group of students

We agreed to take a three-week vacation. The first week would be spent volunteering at a school with impoverished children infected with the HIV virus. The second would be spent at a resort on the magnificent island of Zanzibar in Tanzania, coupled with a safari in the Kenyan Maasai Mara. The third week of our adventure was divided between visiting internally displaced persons (IDP) camps and spending Rosh Hashana at Nairobi's majestic synagogue.

Needless to say, our island getaway and safari were breathtaking, but the time we spent volunteering made impressions on us that will never be forgotten. Agape Hope Centre is the name of the school and orphanage we worked at. While there, we lived with its founders, pastors Maggie Kimaiyo and Oliver Chiraba. Maggie was born in Kenya and Oliver migrated there as a teenager after fleeing recruitment into Congo's child armies.

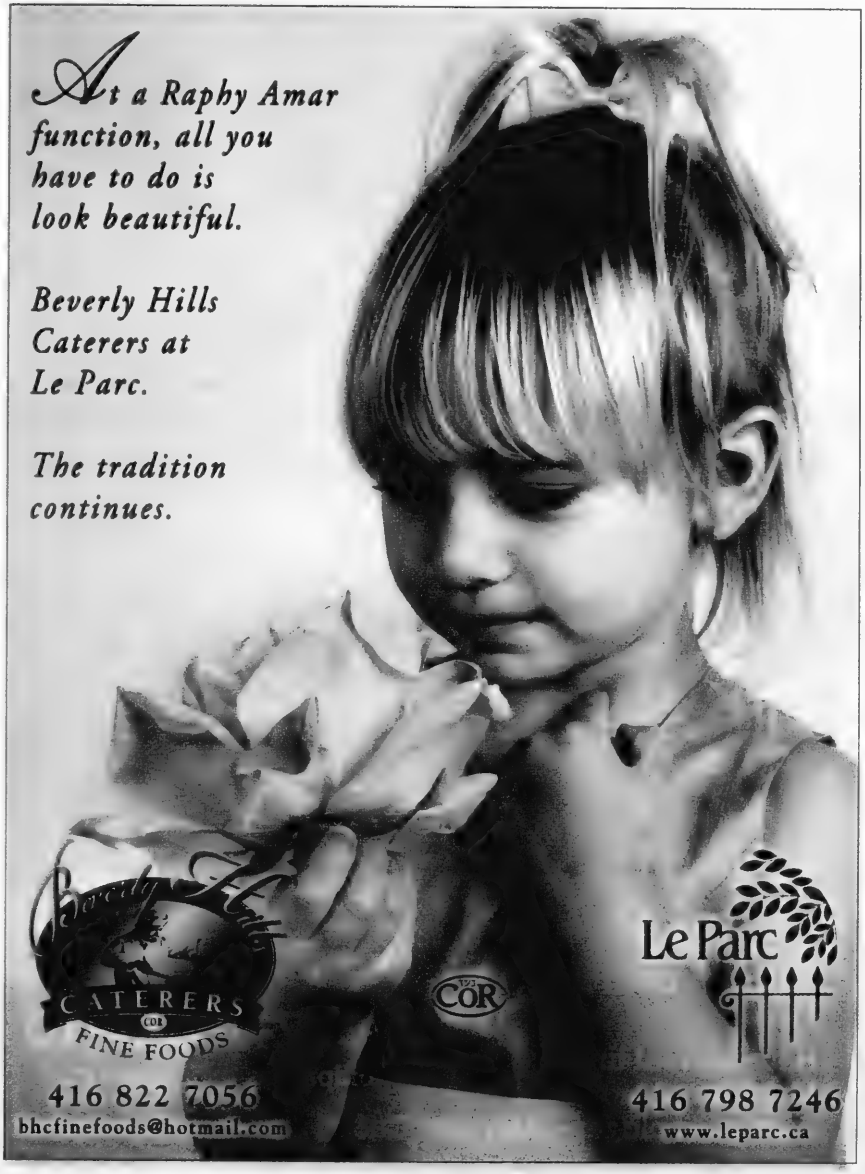
Sherri and Michael

These two people give everything they have and much more to the children they feed, house and educate. Elementary school is free in Kenya, but places such as Agape Hope exist because there are so many schoolchildren who can't afford the cost of shoes, uniforms and books – necessities that aren't supplied by the government. Agape Hope provides these necessities, as well as the only meal these children eat all day. The school is made up of a series of corrugated aluminum shacks, where children sit on wooden benches, above dirt floors and learn from a hodgepodge of donated textbooks. They rarely have the same teacher for more than two weeks at a time and often spend hours not learning at all.

Our days were spent building a shelving unit for the school's books, and teaching math and language arts. Our evenings were spent with Oliver, Maggie and their family, which includes two adopted daughters they saved from ill-equipped mothers. Electricity is often rationed in Nairobi, and there was no running water in the apartment.

We saw poverty in its truest and most depressing form. For one week, we gave up all of the luxuries most Canadians take for granted and lived alongside people who can't afford to eat three square meals a day and children who might not live to see adulthood merely because of the country they were born in. We learned that there's absolutely nothing separating them and us except for chance and the providence we were granted to be born in Canada. And most of all, we learned to take nothing for granted. To this day, those lessons play central roles in our new lives as husband and wife.

Now, about four months removed, we realize that our "honeymoon for humanity" was as important for us as it was for the children we tried to help.



Couple celebrates the 'glory of love'

By ELAINE COHEN
Supplement co-ordinator

"You've got to give a little, take a little and let your poor heart break a little. That's the story of, that's the glory of love..."
The Glory of Love (composed by Billy Hill, 1936)

Sybil and Dave Weigensberg recall cheering for Les Canadiens hockey team on their first date at the Montreal Forum.

Like the Habs in the 1950s, the Weigensbergs have rallied as a winning team. For close to six decades, the couple have withstood hard blows, overcome hurdles and celebrated victories.

Marking their 56th wedding anniversary last month, on Jan. 24, the celebrants reflected on their marriage and family life.

Their wedding, officiated by Rabbi Maurice Cohen, took place in 1954 at Congregation Shaare Zion. After honeymooning in New York, the couple settled in an apartment on Plamondon Avenue. When Heather, their firstborn, was nine months old, the elated couple bought a bungalow in Cote St. Luc. Their parental joy continued with the birth of Joel in 1957 and Risa in 1961. When Sybil's mother died, she and Dave welcomed her father into their home.

"He lived with us for 15 years, and twice a day he'd walk to shul. My father never missed a day of davening."

Sybil, 79, and Dave, 86, keep a kosher home, and they remain long-standing members of Congregation Beth Zion in Cote St. Luc.

The Weigensberg children matured beautifully and brought their parents lots of joy. Heather, a registered nurse, derived pleasure from her duties assisting physicians and patients in the case room at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH). Joel acquired ownership of a service station. Risa, a health professional, also works in the obstetrics unit at the JGH. In addition, Dave and Sybil were blessed when Risa gave birth to Ian (Beckenstein), now 19. Heather and Joel also welcomed the birth of their nephew. However, Heather's happiness was short-lived. Ian was only three months old, when Heather died waiting for a liver transplant.

The family was devastated, and the community mourned her death. Three years later, Risa gave birth to a girl and named her Hailee, in memory of Heather.

Sybil and Dave have always maintained an open attitude about Heather's death. "We talk about her often and in spirit she's still very much with us," Sybil says, motioning to a table in the living room with memorabilia related to Heather.

In addition, framed photographs and letters from the grandchildren adorn the Weigensberg's heimish home.

As for coping mechanisms, Sybil credits a support group for putting them on the right track. After Heather's death, they attended a program at the Montreal Children's Hospital and sought solace from other parents who had suffered a similar loss.

"I wouldn't have joined without Dave, but he agreed and it helped," Sybil says.

Throughout the years, Sybil and Dave have maintained a loyal circle of friends.

They have also developed an amazing bond with their grandchildren.

"Whether Risa and the kids come to us or we bring Shabbat dinner to them is immaterial, but the bottom line is we get together," Dave says. "Now the kids are getting older and they are busy with activities, and they are extremely productive."

Regarding their secret for marital longevity, they admit in some ways it was easier for newlyweds in the 1950s than it is for couples today.

"In our era, a wife took care of the house and kids and the husband went to work," Sybil says, "and nobody questioned it."

According to Dave, a marriage can't work unless each partner is willing to give and take a little. "Marriage is a two-way street. Either one gives in or the two have to come to an agreement. If Sybil feels strongly about something and I don't care one way or the other about it, I'll go along with her. She does the same for me. Even trivial disagreements add up, so it pays to save your battles."

Dave and Sybil Weigensberg, in 1954, prepare to sign the ketubah, with Rabbi Maurice Cohen in attendance.

Both were born and brought up in Montreal.

Dave and his siblings lived right across the street from Devonshire Elementary School, while Sybil (née Lubin) and her brother Irving grew up in Outremont. Sybil attended Guy Robert Drummond Elementary School and Strathcona High School.

Dave devoted his early adulthood to military service. A veteran of World War II, he served in Belgium, Holland, France, England and Germany. After the war, he was deployed to Germany, as part of the occupation forces.

Upon his return to Montreal, Dave, along with his partner, Hyman Lambert, opened and operated service stations. Their partnership continued until Dave's retirement in the 1990s.

"Our first station was on McGill Street, and we also had a parking lot," he says, adding throughout the years they ran stations on Somerled Avenue, Cote St. Luc Road and Westminster Avenue.

"Dave would be out of the house by 6 a.m. and would arrive home exhausted at 10 p.m.," Sybil says. "That's why I served the kids their meat meal at lunch, because he'd be too tired to eat a big meal at that hour." Nevertheless, Dave still made time to maintain his garden in the summer and clear snow during the winter.

When queried on how he adapted to retirement after working 16-hour days, Dave pointed to his wife and quipped good-naturedly, "It's easy, she keeps me busy. We're always running and shopping."

Until recently, they spent winters in Florida, and they continue to keep in touch with their friends down south.

17 minutes

By NATALIE FINGERHUT

"Rabbi , will you marry us?"

"I don't think that is legal," Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut replied. My fiancé, Rob and I had taken Rabbi Plaut, my former boss, and his wife out for dinner to ask if he would officiate at our upcoming nuptials.

"But I will marry you to each other." He winked. "Is he the one you e-mailed me about?"

Rabbi Plaut was the first person I had told about Rob, knowing he would be happy that I had finally met a nice Jewish boy.

"Yup. He's the one."

"Does he know what he's in for?" Another wink.

"Is there anything we need to know about the ceremony? I was just at a wedding and the bride broke a glass. Can I do that?" I asked.

"Not in front of me."

He looked at both of us. "The ceremony will take exactly 17 minutes. You will have your shoulders covered, as will everyone up on the bimah. You will repeat exactly what I say, and then you will kiss."

"Seventeen minutes. Really? That's less than a period of hockey." I said.

"Miss Fingerhut," Rabbi Plaut sighed. I had been his research assistant on two of his many books, and we had developed a rapport based on respect and humour with a twist of irreverence. "I have been doing this longer than you have been alive. There are rules and customs that must be followed. Marriage is a serious business."

He looked at his wife, Elizabeth. "We have been married 60 years, you know."

Natalie and Rob

Rob and I got married on Aug. 9, 1998, at Holy Blossom Temple. After we signed the marriage papers in the rabbi's office, Rob pulled the veil over my face and everyone left, leaving me alone with Rabbi Plaut for a moment.

"Rabbi, do I really have to wear this veil. It doesn't really suit me. I'd prefer a baseball hat."

He knew I was nervous and took my hand. "Come, Miss Fingerhut."

"Seventeen minutes and it will be over?"

"Seventeen minutes."

Unfortunately, I remember little of what Rabbi Plaut said during the ceremony. The only words that I recall clearly were: "Brief kiss, brief kiss, brief kiss," in that unforgettable voice.

We wound up kissing the air.

"Thanks for marrying me," I said to him later.

"I didn't marry you, Mrs. Winters."

"Ms. Fingerhut," I corrected him.

"Well, mazel tov, Ms. Fingerhut. I hope you both are as happy as I have been in my marriage."

Eleven years is not quite 60, but so far so good.

Natalie Fingerhut is an editor at University of Toronto Press and a member of the board of the directors at the Miles Nadal JCC.

JDate and Scrabble brings singles together

By DAPHNA WUNCH
Special to The CJN

After many years of online dating and setups, I received a message on my JDate account that caught my attention.

As I'm an avid Scrabble player, receiving a "flirt" inviting me to play couldn't have been more appropriate. The flirt was something to the effect of, "I don't know what your idea of a good time is, but mine is a game of Scrabble."

How could this random stranger (who turned out not to be so random) have known? So I replied. We messaged back and forth a couple of times, spoke on the phone and set our first date. On March 23, 2008, I met the man I'd been looking for for so long. We later discovered that we had several friends in common, who all agreed that we were a great match. I guess we don't have a Yente in the bunch.

Bram picked me up and, unbeknownst to him, he took me to one of my favourite restaurants for brunch. It lasted for four hours that were filled with scintillating and sweet conversation, even better than my cream-cheese-filled chocolate French toast. The date went so well that I forgot my doggie bag.

We went out again later that week, and I knew that he was different. Kind, thoughtful, generous, romantic and funny as heck (according to our wedding planner)! Still, being the experienced dater that I was, I waited to get really excited until after we had our fourth date. After countless more dates, meeting the families and surviving a puppy (who had an "accident" on Bram the first night I brought the puppy home), all of his qualities were still in abundance and I knew he was a keeper.

New way to propose

This past July, the story came full circle. Bram challenged me to a game of Scrabble at the cottage. When I got to the board, there were already tiles laid out. I had to read it twice as it said, "Will you marry me?" I couldn't believe it. I gave Bram a huge hug and started to cry. He asked me what my answer was, and I, of course, replied, "Yes." My Scrabble winnings had never been so rewarding, and there wasn't a triple word score in sight.

We've been planning the wedding for several months and are excited to report that it's only a few weeks away. The journey has just begun, and I am looking forward to what our life together has in store.

Bubbie watches wedding video in real time

By SHARON LEWIN
Special to The CJN

Three weeks before our daughter, Zoe, was to be married at Congregation Rodeph Sholom in New York City, my mother, then 88 years old, fell ill in Vancouver.

Two weeks before the wedding, I flew to Vancouver. Ma was still in the hospital, recovering slowly, but fatigued and weak. It was clear to me that she would not be able to make the trip to New York. Deep disappointment abounded, especially for Zoe, who is very close to her grandmother.

Wringing our hands and lamenting the situation was not helping anyone feel better. My husband, in his calm and persistent manner, found a wedding videographer, Ariel Andres, who streams videos of weddings in real time on a temporary website. His website explains the process and has an excellent FAQ section. We contacted Ariel, who agreed to travel to New York to film the ceremony and the reception. We paid him what we thought was a fair price and covered his hotel stay for the night of the wedding.

Apart from my mother, all of the Vancouver family was able to travel to New York for the wedding. My brother asked his friend, Steve, to come to our mum's house on the wedding day, Aug. 5, 2007, with a laptop computer. In a house with no Internet service, Steve was able to rig something up so that there was a good connection. My mother was able to watch the wedding as it actually occurred. During the reception, many wedding guests, family, and the bride and groom visited the video camera to say a special hello to her.

My mother watched the ceremony, the reception, the speeches and the dancing. My husband ended his speech with, "Ma, we miss you."

My mother complained. She wanted to know why she could only see Zoe from the back during the ceremony. I tried to explain that everyone physically present at the wedding also only saw Zoe from the back because the chossen and kallah were where they were supposed to be, under the chupah, facing the rabbis.

It wasn't perfect. We would have loved to see Ma's face shining with naches and joy. We would have loved to see her in the beautiful dress my sister helped her buy for the wedding. We would have loved to see her receive the kavod she deserved.

But at our end we knew she could see us and hear the music and watch the dancing. We knew she was as present as she could be, even 4,000 miles away.

And in her house in Vancouver, watching the wedding on the computer, she just kept asking Steve, "How do they get the wedding on that little machine?"

So much for a good plan...

On New Years Eve 2009, during a private candle-lit picnic, Rudy asked me to marry him. Thrilled with visions of our future together, we immediately began discussing dates.

While Rudy was ready to plan a wedding for the upcoming months, I, being a rational individual (as he likes to point out) decided that the "rational" thing to do was to wait until I completed graduate school. While this long time frame created somewhat of a torturous anticipation for both of us, I was also eased by the amount of time we had to plan.

Our planning began almost immediately, within days we were searching out venues. However, once that was chosen, the procrastination set in. Knowing how much time I had, little was done before May, when I left for a semester of school in New York City. However, I did have a plan. Once I arrived home in August, we would have a full month to scout out vendors before the start of school.

Unfortunately, I was quickly reminded that no matter what you plan, life sometimes has a way of throwing you off track.

One week before my arrival home, I received a call from Rudy informing me that he was on his way to the hospital. We soon found out that my healthy, athletic, 30-year-old fiancé was having heart problems. This bizarre set of events sent all of us (friends and family) into complete hysterics. The emotional toll was inconceivable. Needless to say, wedding plans were the last thing on my mind.

Sabrina and Rudy

While it has taken a couple months, Rudy has thankfully made a full recovery and has been left with nothing less than a tremendous learning experience, and an even greater appreciation for life.

Once everything eventually settled, it was back to the wedding plans – now, with even more excitement and appreciation in knowing that together we had overcome a tremendous challenge. We quickly made a number of other small arrangements.

However, it wasn't long before tragedy stuck again. About a month later, I found myself once again sitting in the hospital, but this time it wasn't for Rudy, it was for my father. Fortunately, he has also fought through his sickness, and since then, our lives have mostly recovered.

Now it's less than one year until the big day, and due to our unfortunate distractions, there is still much to do. However, when our wedding day eventually arrives, we can confidently stand under our chupah, knowing that together we have the strength to confront life's greatest challenges.

It is truly a small world

By JULIE PILTZ
Special to The CJN

I'm from Toronto and Mike was raised in Montreal, but somehow we found each other at McGill University, where we met for the first time in late 2001.

Mike and Julie

During our first year at McGill, we were placed on the same winter carnival team, which is one of the main social events put on by the faculty of management. I spotted Mike from across the room and asked my friend about him. It turns out that she actually knew Mike from their days at Bialik High School. Mike and I became friends, but only started officially dating a year and a half later.

We were dating a few months when Mike came to visit me during summer break in Toronto. It was then that my dad put two and two together and realized where he had seen Mike's last name before. He ran downstairs and returned with a dusty yearbook. He flipped a few pages and came to a high school picture of himself. Then, without a word, he flipped to the very last entry, and there was a picture of Abe Zylberlicht, Mike's dad. It turns out that both of our fathers were in the same grade together at Outremont High School in Montreal.

There were many other interesting connections that Mike and I discovered as time passed. From Mike's dad being an usher at my best friend's parents' wedding to the similarly sounding streets that we grew up on (McMorran and McMurray), you might say that we were truly bashert, meant to be together.

At the beginning of 2007, we switched cities as Mike moved to Toronto for graduate school and I stayed in Montreal to complete my schooling. We were apart for a year and a half, but saw each other frequently. His family took good care of me in Montreal, and my family's door was always open to him in Toronto. In the summer of 2008, I moved back to Toronto and we were once again in the same city.

Last June, we had our six-year anniversary. Approximately three weeks later Mike planned a perfect evening and proposed to me in his apartment in Toronto. There were roses everywhere and teddy bears dressed up as a bride and groom.

When I called both of our families with the wonderful news, I had no idea that his family was in town and that everyone I had just spoken to was anxiously waiting for us in a limousine downstairs. Mike truly planned every detail to perfection.

We are currently in the planning phase for an August wedding at a synagogue in Toronto, and celebrate we will! There is so much to do, but we are enjoying every moment and both our families are very supportive. Most importantly, we can't wait to spend the rest of our lives together.

The secret to a 60-year marriage

By REBECCA DENNIS
Special to The CJN

They sit on the sofa together, watching TV, holding hands. While she's busy at the kitchen sink, he comes up behind her and nuzzles the back of her neck. Newlyweds? Hardly. On Dec. 31, 2009 Rita and Sol Dennis celebrated their 60th wedding anniversary on a Caribbean cruise.

Sol, working as furrier on Spadina, first caught Rita's attention by waving to her through his window. She sat across the bustling avenue proudly designing patterns for coats and dresses. Despite Sol's two left feet, he captured the heart of the beautiful, vibrant designer.

With their vastly different ideas, hobbies and habits, they got married on New Year's Eve 1949, honeymooned in New York City and started to build a family.

While Sol was fishing, playing handball, and drinking with his buddies at the Y, Rita was busy making matching shifts for the girls, Cheryl, Cindy, and Darlene, and surfer trunks for Steven. And while Rita's favourite colours are turquoise, coral and fuchsia, the best way Sol can describe his car is dark. That's because while she has a great flare for colour, Sol is colourblind.

Rita continued to thrive in her design career while Sol diligently built up his business, which supported the family for over 20 years. Dominion Smallwares became a second home and favourite hangout to many, especially on Fridays, when Sol brought the bagels in.

They are both retired now and divide their time between Miami (winters), their condo in Don Mills and their cottage on Lake Simcoe. With their children married, and eight grandchildren ranging in age from 18 to 28, you'd think they'd be busy enough, but they're both very active.

Sol plays golf and volunteers with Man to Man, a prostate cancer support group. Rita sculpts, paints, gardens, swims, rows, cooks and takes exercise classes at the Y. They also have many friends and enjoy a busy social life.

When asked "What is the key to a successful marriage?" Rita answered in one word, "compromise!"

There may be just a little more to it though. A love that lasts 60 years doesn't hurt.

Grenada offers luxurious, environmentally friendly resorts

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

With its beautiful weather, gorgeous beaches, luxury resorts and friendly people, Grenada makes a wonderful honeymoon destination.

Though measuring only 19 kilometres by 34 kilometres, the island, long known as The Spice Island, boasts as many as 45 beaches, including the three-kilometre long Grand Anse Beach.

There are plenty of romantic, secluded resorts to choose from on this Caribbean island. Here are some that stand out.

The luxury Spice Island Beach Resort has been redesigned after the 2004 hurricane that devastated much of the country. The resort now contains 64 suites, half of which are directly on Grand Anse Beach. Guests can literally step out of their rooms and into the Caribbean Sea. Yet, they still have their own private patio with chaise lounges and hammocks.

The beach is wonderful for romantic strolls, stretching as far as it does. You can walk for about 10 minutes and come across some popular local hangouts where you can share a drink with the English-speaking locals. They are very friendly and will not bother you at all.

The rooms on the other side of the hotel are only a short walk from the beach. They have their own swimming pools in a closed-in terrace, and with their own private entrance and tropical garden, these are ideal rooms for a romantic retreat.

The Grenada Grand Beach Resort

The luxury cinnamon and saffron suites are palatial suites at the water's edge. At 1,440 square feet, they are furnished with a dining table for six and a spacious living room.

The restaurant is built on an open-concept design allowing the cool breeze from the nearby ocean to refresh guests. The menu changes daily on a two-week rotation.

The resort, like several others on the island, is committed to the environment. In December 2009, the Spice Island Beach Resort received the Green Globe Certification Award. The resort uses solar rooftop heaters and energy-efficient fluorescent bulbs throughout the property. It uses water from the sea through an on-property desalinization plant. The main swimming pool and all the private suite pools are purified with a chemical-free system, using salt instead of chlorine. It also maintains a vegetable and herb garden. For sheer beauty, Maca Bana takes the prize. Completely isolated, yet minutes from the capital of St. George's, Maca Bana is ideal for honeymooners. This resort is situated on two acres of hillside land, above the stunning white-sand Magazine Beach, steps away from Grand Anse Beach. It consists of only seven villas: two one-bedroom banas, and five deluxe banas. Each has its own fully equipped kitchen.

Outside, on a hardwood deck, guests can enjoy their own private Jacuzzi pool or sit in loungers and watch the spectacular scenery.

The fully landscaped tropical garden has a wide variety of plants, flowers and fruits growing, and there's a swimming pool overlooking the beach below.

The resort offers private cooking lessons performed right in your kitchen. Learn how to cook scrumptious local specialty dishes like callaloo soup. You can also have your own private art lessons with resident fine artist and resort owner Rebecca Thompson.

Trip Advisor rates Maca Bana as the best resort in Grenada, and it's easy to see why. It is also very green, not just with the lush gardens that surround the villas but also with its environmentally sound policies. The resort has over 100 solar panels, composting, a fruit orchard, plus its own organic farm where fruit and short crops are harvested for The Aquarium, the resort's exclusive restaurant. www.macabana.com

The Grenada Grand Beach Resort is located on Grand Anse Beach, just 10 minutes away from St. George's. This resort is the largest on the island, boasting 240 luxurious rooms and suites. Each room has a private balcony with a beach or garden view. The resort has two swimming pools, the 300-foot Fantasy Pool with a sunken bar and giant waterfalls; and the 60-foot Sunset Pool, which is more secluded.

Maca Bana's view is truly stunning.

For something a little bit different try the Petite Anse Hotel. This resort is located on the north coast of the island, off the beaten track and relatively undiscovered.

The hotel is one of the newest in Grenada, set to celebrate its first anniversary in March. It has 11 rooms, each with a panoramic view of the beach and Grenada's sister island, Carriacou, in the near distance. The constant breeze from the shore keeps the hotel virtually mosquito free.

Like many other hotels on the island, it is environmentally conscious. The Petite Anse Hotel uses recycled water to hydrate its tropical gardens and uses fruits and vegetables from the Old Plantation House where the owners of the hotel live. www.petiteanse.com

Seclusion and intimacy seem to be general themes, and the Bel Air Plantation on the southeast part of Grenada is no different. Nestled on a hillside overlooking a yacht-filled bay, the Bel Air Plantation has just 11 beautiful villas and cottages, carefully oriented for maximum privacy and each with both sea and bay views.

The resort is nestled within 18 acres of gardens bursting with colour, orchards and wildlife like butterflies and hummingbirds. This resort is a well-hidden paradise. www.belairplantation.com

La Luna is unique in that its décor offers guests a taste of East Asian style blended with traditional Caribbean. The main club house consists of several low-lying wooden buildings with overhanging thatched roofs.

Like most of the other resorts reviewed here, it is completely secluded, yet only 10 minutes from Maurice Bishop International Airport, on the southwestern tip of the island.

There are 16 one- and two-bedroom cottages, each designed in an open-style plan to take advantage of the ocean view. Even the bathrooms are partially exposed to the natural environment. Each room contains a four-poster Balinese king-size bed.

The resort has a unique Asian spa featuring two treatment rooms, and a tatami room in which massages are done on the floor on a special mat that allows for more stretching and foot pressure using the therapist's body weight.

La Luna also features food products grown in its organic gardens. This resort has been written up in such magazines as Vogue, Instyle and even Sports Illustrated, and guests have included models Kate Moss and Jerry Hall, although I didn't spot them on my quick visit there. www.laluna.com

A dream come true

By LAURIE TEITELMAN
Special to The CJN

So here I was: tanned, relaxed and anxiously awaiting my boyfriend and his family's arrival at the Fort Lauderdale airport.

My entire family had just come off of the world's largest cruise ship, but somehow, what I was about to experience made the rest of my 2009-10 winter vacation memories momentarily fade away.

Kevin's family arrived – laughs, stories, smiles, hugs, kisses and flowers were all exchanged. We had truly missed each other.

Once the mountains of luggage were checked through, Kevin gathered our entire crew into a circle just outside of the security gate, got down on one knee and proposed!

Everyone was instantly cheering, crying, hugging, passing around phones with congratulatory messages, snapping pictures. Love was in the air.

As I glanced at the sparkling ring, I kept asking aloud, "Is this really happening?"

I quickly jumped into Kevin's arms and gave him the biggest hug and kiss, screaming, Yes!

Kevin reached over to put the ring on my finger, and his mom yelled, "Not that hand, the other hand!"

I was so surprised. None of us had a clue what was in store for us on this palindrome day 01/02/2010, also my father's birthday! A 1980 bottle of Dom Perignon was popped and passed around for a celebratory "Cheers" in the middle of the airport. (I have never tasted better champagne in my life!)

An airport engagement

The airport also shared in this momentous occasion by providing us with vouchers for our honeymoon – a bonus!

Pictures later revealed that the engagement was at exactly 11:11 a.m. – talk about perfect timing!

Two flights later, we finally arrived back home, but the whirlwind of emotions didn't end there. My now fiancé had set up another surprise: trailing up the stairs of our five-storey New York apartment were 10 dozen red rose petals!

Kevin carried me over the threshold, and to my amazement, there were hundreds more petals spread out on the bed, in the tub, covering the floor, on the couch spelling out "I love you." Chilled champagne was in the sink, and there were freshly cut strawberries and chocolates. Red and white candles in the shape of a huge heart surrounded a dozen more pink roses.

We are so in love.

I felt like a princess in the most romantic movie of all time, but this time, it was real. This is one happy beginning that will last forever. I love you Kevin, you are my dream come true.

Better than I could ever have dreamed

By JENNIFER RALSTON
Special to The CJN

I was never the kind of girl who fantasized about her wedding. Although I figured I'd get married someday, I had never breathlessly imagined the day or the actual experience. Likewise, I hadn't ever put much thought into what kind of Jewish life I would lead. As a Reform kid in the United States, I saw "Jewish" as being mostly about food, holidays and family back in New York and Florida.

By the time I met Paul, the man I would marry, I had been attending holiday services for a number of years at Toronto's Reconstructionist synagogue, Darchei Noam. What a joy to have discovered that there was a branch of Judaism that emphasizes egalitarianism, making Jewish traditions relevant to modern life.

Eventually, it was time to spend several hectic months envisioning the day I'd never really planned. While I was not formally a member at Darchei Noam, it seemed natural to approach the congregation's rabbi, Tina Grimberg, to ask if she would marry us.

Although Paul, having been raised in a Conservative household, had never experienced a Reconstructionist service, when we met with Rabbi Grimberg, we both felt strongly that we had made the right choice. Her thoughtfulness, spirit and profound emotion are immediately clear to anyone who hears her speak.

Paul and I incorporated several modernized, Reconstructionist elements into our wedding ceremony. We added a passage to the accepted Reform ketubah text that pledges mutual trust, respect, devotion and companionship. During the bedecken, before Paul lowered the veil over my face, I presented him with a special kippah.

Approaching the chupah, we added another modern twist when it came to the traditional circling of the groom by the bride. Rather than my walking around him seven times, we preferred the idea of circling each other three times each and walking the last circle together, to symbolize mutual protection and the home we were creating for each other.

For the chanting of the seven brachot, we were extremely lucky to hear Phyllis Angel Greenberg, a cantorial soloist at Darchei Noam. She is blessed with a voice that touches your heart with her first note.

Finally, during the ring ceremony, we were able to not only place the rings on each other's fingers, but also say the vows that accompany this act.

My husband and I truly felt this was a relevant, respectful way to begin our marriage. More than a year later, my husband and I still hear from our family and friends that the ceremony really did reflect our personalities. So many people were struck by the beauty in Rabbi Grimberg's words and emotion, by Phyllis' voice and songs, and by updated interpretations of familiar traditions.

Our wedding was still Jewish, and it was still us. And even though I never fantasized about it growing up, I can't imagine having done it any other way.

Grandparents attend wedding as virtual participants

By FRANK SIMKEVITZ
Special to The CJN

Last year our son, Steven, got married in Toronto. The entire family was excited that our youngest son was getting married to a wonderful young woman, Lihor, whom he met almost 10 years ago.

Everything was shaping up to be a major family affair, except for one thing: Steven's grandparents live in Montreal and his grandfather, suffering from a long-term illness, and grandmother would not be able to travel and share in our simchah.

I was familiar with the technology that would allow a video signal to be captured and sent to another location many kilometres away, and was even aware that it could be accomplished over the Internet. But, I had no idea how to organize it.

We wanted to ensure that the quality of the image and the audio would be much better than you could expect off a webcam. We also knew that what Steven's grandparents really wanted to see would be the ceremony and the first part of the dinner, which would capture some of the speeches. The rest they could easily see on a video afterward. I was hoping that perhaps Steven's grandparents could actually say something to Steven and Lihor in real time over the telephone, not necessarily through two-way video.

I contacted our videographer (Video by Josh), and he was extremely helpful in finding a videographer who had the capability and expertise in video-teleconferencing. He recommended Peter Mykusz. I spoke with Peter at length and described exactly what we were looking for and that his services would only be required for about two to three hours. We determined that having Steven's grandparents actually talk to Steven and Lihor was going to be a little too complicated without getting into much more sophisticated technology. I also learned that the cost would be reasonable, considering the work and technology involved.

We agreed on a fee. Peter explained that all we would have to do is have a computer with Internet access set up at Steven's grandparents' home and he'd provide us with a website to go to in order to download the signal. We arranged all that – a friend of our nephew in Montreal brought over a computer and we arranged for a company to provide Internet access.

The day arrived and Peter showed up and began to set up. Once he was set up, I called Montreal and asked my nephew's friend to log onto the website. I must admit that I was quite nervous (as anyone who was aware of what was happening can attest to), and I was on the phone with Montreal for about half an hour, checking to see if the signal was working at that end.

Under the chupah

Finally, we got the signal to work, both picture and sound, just minutes before the ceremony was to start. I can still remember the excitement in my mother-in-law's (Steven's grandmother) voice when she saw the sanctuary filled with people and could hear and see everything so clearly. I stayed on the phone for a few minutes while the ceremony started, just to ensure that the signal was still there and then finally hung up.

Later, once everyone was in the hall for dinner, we re-established the signal, and Steven's grandparents were able to watch the first half hour of the festivities and see some of the speeches. Just before we signed off, I spoke with my mother-in-law and father-in-law, and could sense the emotion in their voices and how much they appreciated being able to share in the simchah. Steven's grandparents were indeed able to virtually participate in Steven and Lihor's wedding. For that, we are extremely grateful.

Purim: a celebration of courage

It is one of the powerful paradoxes of the holiday of Purim that its entire commemorative imagery is one of high-spirited, playful, even clownish celebration. The young girl in pixie-ish costume running through a flowered meadow in the Elah Valley in Israel and Lia Loebenberg's colourful drawing are pleasant proof of this fact.

It is also a testament to the genius of our ancient sages that they steered an exceedingly difficult moment of national rescue into an exceedingly cathartic frolic of festival and delight.

If not for a king's restless night, which set in motion a train of unlikely but purposeful events, the Jews of Persia would have been on the verge of annihilation and destruction.

Of course, among those purposeful events were the actions of Esther that displayed determination and daring. Her decision to address the king, though unsummoned by him, was brave in the extreme. Had the self-absorbed, narcissistic Achashverosh chosen to ignore her, let alone her entreaty, she knew her life was forfeit. Nevertheless, Esther risked her life to save her people.

Purim is fundamentally a celebration of courage.

Being courageous has been both a requirement and a hallmark of every Jewish generation in our history.

Even this week, as we prepare once again to gragger Haman's name into deaf oblivion, our community, and especially our students on campus, have also prepared to stand up to and counter the deviously vile campaign against the Jewish state known as Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW).

Editorial

Lia Loebenberg

That campaign is now in its sixth year and continues to spread to campuses across the western world. There is no relent. It is yet another front in the fiendishly obsessive effort to do away with the Jewish state.

As previous years have shown, it's not an easy thing, not a shrug of the shoulders, for students – Jewish and non-Jewish – who care about Israel, who care about freedom of speech on campus, who care about the sanctity of democratic values in our society, to walk past the aggressive IAW propagandists.

For one thing, the propagandists make it difficult to simply walk away. For another, conscience compels one not to walk away.

Not walking away, however, often requires courage.

We commend our students who this year, along with community leaders and umbrella groups such as the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, local federations and Hillel, are, even now, countering the lie of apartheid with truth.

Jews of all affiliations and levels of involvement feel threatened during IAW, Ryerson University student Esther Mendelsohn told The CJN last week.

The Jews of ancient Persia also felt threatened, although to be sure, the threat was of greater immediate physical consequence.

Just as the Jews did then in ancient Persia, Jews today across Canada have assembled as a community, with courage in their hearts, to ward off the enemies who would celebrate the destruction of Israel.

Chag Samayach.

Novopharm No More

TORONTO — Israel-based Teva Pharmaceutical Industries, the world's largest generic drug maker, said last week it's changing the name of its Canadian subsidiary Teva Novopharm to Teva Canada, in order to reinforce the company's links to its Israeli parent. Teva Canada employs 1,400 people across Canada, most notably at facilities in Stouffville, Markham and Toronto, Ont. Novopharm was founded 45 years ago by pharmacist Leslie Dan. It was purchased by Teva in 2000.

Zundel Leaving Jail

BERLIN — Notorious Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel, 70, will be released from a German prison March 1 after serving a five-year sentence, a German prosecutor said last week. Zundel, a German citizen who was deported from Canada in 2005, received credit for time spent in custody ahead of his 2007 trial. He was jailed for 14 counts of inciting hatred, including contributing hate material to his U.S.-based website. He was able to be charged in Germany because the site was accessible there.

Editor Sentenced

MOSCOW — The editor of an anti-Semitic newspaper was sentenced to three years in a prison colony for inciting ethnic and religious hatred. Konstantin Dushenov, editor of Russ Pravoslavnaya (Orthodox Russia), was also banned from publishing for three years, the Union of Councils for Jews in the Former Soviet Union reported. Two other staffers received suspended sentences on the same charge. The men had distributed an anti-Semitic film throughout the country called Russia With a Knife in the Back, which is on a list of banned extremist materials.

Chabad Targeted

MUMBAI — A bomb that exploded in a crowded cafe in India was likely meant for a nearby Chabad house, Indian authorities said. The bomb that detonated Feb. 13 in Pune killed nine people and injured 57. The bakery is located several dozen yards from the city's Chabad house. Pune is 125 miles southeast of Mumbai, where in November 2008 a major terror attack at several sites, including the Chabad house, killed 179 people, including six Jewish victims at the Chabad centre. Officials said the Pune Chabad house had been under surveillance by David Headley, a Pakistani American in jail in Chicago for scouting out targets for the Mumbai attack. The Pune bomb was left in a bag by terrorists pretending to be customers, reports said. Police said another man was meant to pick up the bag and take it to the Chabad house, but it exploded when a waiter opened it.

Oldest Jew Dies

ZURICH — Rosa Rein, believed to be the world's oldest Jew, died about a month shy of her 113th birthday. Rein, Switzerland's oldest resident since September 2003, died Feb. 14 in her sleep at an old-age home near Lugano, her residence since a fall in 2001.

Singer wrote My Sharona For Jewish Girl

LOS ANGELES — Doug Fieger, the Jewish lead singer of the band The Knack who wrote the 1979 hit My Sharona for his Jewish girlfriend, died Feb. 14 in Los Angeles of cancer at age 57.

Doug Fieger

Fieger had been diagnosed with brain tumours in 2006.

The Knack, an all-Jewish, Los Angeles-based group fronted by Fieger, earned praise for their debut 1979 album, Get the Knack. Its guitar-based, hook-driven songs were seen as a breath of fresh air in an age of disco and nihilistic punk.

Their signature song was written for Sharona Alperin, who at 17 was 10 years his junior.

Co-written by Knack guitarist Berton Averre, the song's bass-driven beat and shouted, libidinous chorus proved irresistible to club-goers. The band had several other hits, but could never replicate the success of the first album.

In a statement released Feb. 14, Alperin, now a high-end real estate agent in Los Angeles, said, "Doug changed my life forever. He left on Valentine's Day, a day of heart and love, and that was Doug, all heart and love."

Minister expresses 'solidarity' with Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Junior Foreign Affairs Minister Peter Kent said his widely publicized statement that "an attack on Israel is considered an attack on Canada" was made in the context of the "bellicosity" of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Iran's continuing nuclear program.

It was also intended as a message "of solidarity with the only true democracy in the Middle East and as a basic statement of principle," Kent said in an interview with The CJN.

His comments "paraphrase what the prime minister and others in our cabinet have been saying… It sets out clearly and restates the government's position" regarding the threat posed by a nuclear Iran.

"Any potential aggressor should be clear of Canada's position. Any potential aggressor should be well aware this is not lip service," he said.

Peter Kent

In an interview published on Feb. 12, the Conservative MP for Thornhill told Shalom Life, "Prime Minister [Stephen] Harper has made it quite clear for some time now and has regularly stated that an attack on Israel would be considered an attack on Canada."

He told the online magazine, which serves the Israeli expatriate community, that Israel is considered an ally of Canada.

"We work with our allies. We regularly convey our concern in a variety of ways, at the United Nations as well as one on one. Foreign Minister [Lawrence] Cannon made a point last year of travelling all the way to Turkey for a regional conference simply so he could confront directly and personally [Iranian] Foreign Minister [Manouchehr] Mottaki to convey our concern at the time with regards to the brutal repression after the [Iranian] election."

He told Shalom Life that Canada believes the Iranian regime is a threat not just to its own people, but also to the countries surrounding it, including Israel.

Kent told The CJN Canada supports a broad international effort behind enhanced sanctions targeting Iran.

"Unilateral sanctions tend not to work," he said. "Canada, the UN Security Council and countries like Russia are coming together now, and there seems to be an agreement that the tougher talk and harder line against Iran would be timely."

Kent said his statement to Shalom Life was consistent with previous Canadian foreign policy. "It is the same solidarity we expressed a year ago when Israel was subjected to an unacceptable barrage of rockets from Gaza," he said, and the same stance taken during the 2006 Lebanon war.

In May 2008, in a speech marking Israel's 60th anniversary, Harper said, "Those who threaten Israel also threaten Canada, because, as the last world war showed, hate-fuelled bigotry against some is ultimately a threat to us all, and must be resisted wherever it may lurk."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's advocacy arm on Israel, said he was pleased with Kent's statement. "We are increasingly happy that the nature of the relationship is being fleshed out in particular terms, so it is clear what the nature of the bilateral relationship is…

"I think what it means is that an attack on Israel would trigger a set of responses from Canada consistent with an ally being attacked," as opposed to a more general response undertaken when a country with less close ties was in a conflict, he said.

They strive to save lives

"Our mission is service to the Jewish people and service to the world," Menahem Ben-Sasson, president of The Hebrew University of Jerusalem, (Jan. 31, 2010).

Hebrew University's medical sciences facilities are on the Ein Kerem campus on the far western hillside of Jerusalem.

Many people know of the Hadassah Hospital, the anchor of the campus, and of the 12 famous stained-glass Chagall windows in the small synagogue adjacent to the hospital.

But the campus, carved onto the hilltop high above the historically storied valley below, comprises much more than the hospital.

The Ein Kerem campus houses five distinct medical faculties: medicine, dentistry, nursing, occupational therapy and pharmacy. It is the largest educational institute for medical sciences in Israel. The 3,500 students who study there come from all ethnic and socio-economic groups of Israeli society as well as, of course, from around the world.

The place hums from all directions with healing-related activity. It is impossible not to sense the electricity in the super-charged atmosphere of this impossibly busy place that constantly flashes the message: life must be saved.

The largest single institute for medical research on the campus, indeed in the country, is a relatively new one. And it is one in which Canada and Canadian scientists are integrally involved: IMRIC.

The acronym stands for The Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada. It is a bold, imaginative, innovative approach to trying to save lives. More than 100 scientists work there in a multidisciplinary framework, each striving to understand some aspect, ever smaller, ever more particular, but ever more profoundly significant of the many diseases that fell human beings.

From the editor's desk...

IMRIC scientists are Israelis and Canadians. Together they are pushing past and through the terrain of what we know today into what we must know tomorrow if humanity is to vanquish cancer, cardiovascular disease, diabetes, neurodegenerative diseases, infectious diseases and alas, many, many others.

Earlier this month in Jerusalem, The CJN visited with some of the IMRIC researchers.

Prof. David Lichtstein is the chair of IMRIC. His credentials are as long as a legal-size notepad. The former chair of the department of physiology and the former president of the Israel Society for Physiology and Pharmacology knows a great deal, inter alia, about intracellular activities and the interaction of drugs at the molecular and cellular level. But that was not the subject of our discussion nor did we ever come close to it.

David Lichtstein

Rather, the diminutive scholar, researcher and scientist quietly but dreamily spoke of his hopes for IMRIC, its importance to the world of medicine, its importance to everyone.

"We are trying to establish something for the long run," Lichtstein said. And then, echoing the words and the aspirations of Hebrew University president Menahem Ben-Sasson, and even his colleague, Dr. Aharon (Ronnie) Friedman, dean of the Faculty of Agriculture, he said, "We have the possibility of achieving significant results for the entire world."

Over the course of a singularly exciting day, The CJN met with nine IMRIC scientists. Not once through an entire day of introductions, discussions, note-taking and reflection did the feeling leave this writer that vastly exciting, good and important work is being done there.

Space does not permit even the most superficial of elaborations into any of their research. The following are two brief examples of aspects of their work.

Prof. Shosh Ravid at the department of biochemistry and molecular biology sparkled with emotion as she told of her discovery of a short peptide tail in an amino acid actually causing a diseased cancer cell to "commit suicide."

"We can possibly kill the diseased cell, while enabling the good cells to survive," she said.

Dr. Rotem Karni, also of the department of biochemistry and molecular biology somewhat dryly offered that certain aspects of his research into the gene-splicing factors that regulate the behaviour of cancerous cells may yield new tools for diagnosis. His lab has discovered that the appearance of a certain splicing factor may be treatable with already established, identifiable drugs.

The Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU) has taken upon itself the daunting task of raising some $50 million to ensure IMRIC's permanence. CFHU national president Nathan Lindenberg told The CJN last summer that raising those funds was the most significant undertaking in CFHU's history. It could also be a significant undertaking for the future of medical history.

–MBD

To commemorate the 85th anniversary of the opening of The Hebrew University of Jerusalem, The CJN was recently invited by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University to travel to Jerusalem, visit the university and meet and engage with some of its scholars, researchers and teachers.

Prayer service shows solidarity with Kotel women

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A prayer service for Rosh Chodesh Adar brought together participants from all streams of the community in support of women who were arrested recently at the Kotel in Jerusalem for wearing tallits.

The celebration of religious pluralism, held Feb. 14 at the Lipa Green Centre for Jewish Community Services, included silent prayers, tchinas (prayers written for and by women), a performance by Kol Neshama and a talk by educator and CJN columnist Rachael Turkienicz.

Rachael Turkienicz

In introducing the one-hour program, Rabbi Michal Shekel, said that participants hold different siddurs and practise Judaism differently, "but our love for Judaism is [the same.] We are different, yet we stand together as Jews.

"We are here in support of all Jews to express their Judaism. We are here despite our differences, and we all embrace religious pluralism. We are here because our love of tfillah is as essential to the Jewish soul as breathing is to the human body."

Turkienicz said that what was incredible to her about the gathering was that when she looked around, she saw "a tapestry of tallits and no tallits, and both men and women."

What triggered the gathering, she said, was an event at the Kotel in January, when members of Women of the Wall were arrested for wearing tallits. "We have the challenge of living in a world of different Jewish expression."

She said that when God spoke on Mount Sinai, His words were split into 70 tongues. "This was all the languages of existence, the totality of human understanding. Although God spoke one verse, it contained a variety of human understanding.

"A message came from God, and was received by each person differently. It was not supposed to mean the same thing [to everyone.]"

When a community is bonded, Turkienicz said, "then we [have] stability. When we look around the room and notice something that makes us uncomfortable, we have to remember that it is not about our comfort levels, but about our vision and our Torah."

Video footage casts doubt on assault at York U

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Video footage has cast doubts on the accuracy of reports that two Jewish students were assaulted during a pro-Israel event at York University earlier this month, a campus official said.

"From a physical assault perspective, you definitely see that no such thing was occurring," Alex Bilyk, York's director of media relations, said of the footage taken by security cameras of a Feb. 1 event to raise awareness for kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

The video, made available to The CJN, shows animated discussions and gesturing between Jewish and pro-Palestinian students. The recording shows that some 30 students were involved in all.

Police weren't called, but campus security intervened. The Jewish students lodged a complaint with the university's student conduct and dispute resolution office, and York appointed an adjudicator to investigate.

York did refer the case to the Toronto Police hate crimes unit, but no charges were laid.

"The police are very helpful in any kind of incident. In this particular case, we were watching the video and didn't have any audio. There were allegations that some statements may have been made," Bilyk said.

York invited local reporters to view the video.

Tyler Golden, co-president of Hasbara Fellowships at York, said earlier this month that about 50 activists and protesters surrounded 20 or so Jewish students and began chanting anti-Israel and anti-Semitic slurs.

He said two Jewish students were slapped, one on the arm and the other across the face.

Golden said Hasbara members have yet to see the security footage.

"It doesn't seem like we can comment on that unless we see the video footage," he said, adding that Hasbara is in the process of viewing the footage.

UJA campaign closes as donations reach $64M

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The world has a lot to learn from Israel, Dan Senor told an audience of 700 at last week's UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's campaign closing event.

His recently published book, Start-Up Nation: The Story of Israel's Economic Miracle – which he co-wrote with Jerusalem-based Saul Singer – was never intended for Jews, he said.

Senor and Singer, who are brothers-in-law, thought the book would have "prescriptive value," Senor said at the Feb. 16 event at Events on the Park, the site of the former Inn on the Park.

The projected total for this year's UJA campaign – once all pledges are in – is $64 million, announced Ken Tanenbaum, co-chair of the 2010 campaign with Debbie Kimel.

Kimel said that the campaign attracted more than 2,100 new donors as well as donors who have not contributed for several years, representing more than $2.5 million of the total.

Senor, who grew up in Toronto and has an MBA from Harvard Business School, is now an adjunct senior fellow for Middle East studies at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York. He served as a Pentagon and White House adviser based in Qatar from 2003 to 2004, and was one of the longest-serving civilians in Iraq.

In his talk, Senor noted that, on a per capita basis, Israel attracts more venture capital than any other country in the world.

"People often ask, 'what if this is just a confluence of factors, and what if they all disappear?' " Senor said, citing the global technology boom in the 1990s, the influx of Jewish immigrants – many with PhDs in engineering – from the former Soviet Union to Israel, and the sense of hope arising from the Oslo peace process.

In fact, those factors did disappear, he said. "One would expect perhaps global venture capital to level off or decline. Neither happened."

A group of Harvard business students who Senor took to Israel in 2001 wanted to know how Israel pulled off its successes in a state of war, with virtually no natural resources, he recalled.

Real economic growth comes from productivity gains, Senor explained. "Sustained productivity gains, at the end of the day, can only come from true innovation, and the biggest driver for that innovation is technological innovation. Typically, technological innovation happens at the small enterprise level.

"Israel is the quintessential start-up nation."

Although people often attribute Israel's success to Jews being smart or good at business, "we certainly don't have the monopoly on being smart," Senor said. "It's not 'smart' or 'not smart.' It's that [other countries] don't teach their young people how to be risk takers. They don't have a culture where there's a tolerance of failure."

Immigrants, he noted, are the "quintessential entrepreneurs. They know what it's like to have to start over."

In Israel, compulsory military service also plays a role in fostering entrepreneurism, Senor believes. "[Israelis] learn at a very young age what it means to lead, and to deal with imperfect information... [Israel's] military had to be nimble, had to learn to move quickly, and not constantly check with headquarters... There's a complete tolerance in the military for junior people to challenge the decisions made by senior people."

Israel has come up with "jaw-dropping solutions to really big problems," said Senor, citing as one example the camera pill that that shows the inside of patients' intestinal tracts.

In a brief address, Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general for Toronto and Western Canada, said that Israel "gives us many reasons to be proud, but sometimes we feel that when we try to approach others outside our extended family, we don't manage to pass on this pride, and what's left is related to the conflict."

Gissin said that Senor's message is relevant, as is the work Israel has been doing in Haiti following the Jan. 12 earthquake, with the support of UJA.

The evening also included entertainment by the band The Midway State, and mentalist Haim Goldenberg.

Haitian-born Toronto nurse Ketty Jean-Batiste, whose family lost friends in the earthquake, thanked the Jewish community for its support.

Sherry Firestone and Jeff Rosenthal will take over from Kimel and Tanenbaum as chairs of the 2011 campaign, and Sarena Koschitzky will take over from Andrea Cohen as chair of UJA Women's Philanthropy.

Canada, the G8 and Iran

Last week, the International Atomic Energy Agency issued a report saying it had evidence of "past or current undisclosed activities" by Iran to build a nuclear warhead. The IAEA statement should, finally, put paid to the delusion that Tehran has only peaceful purposes in mind for its nuclear enterprise.

Iran steadfastly denies that it is trying to develop nuclear weapons. The issue however, is no longer the truth of Iran's assertions. The issue now is what to do with Iranian prevarications that even the United Nations – as expressed through the voice of its atomic energy watchdog – can no longer tolerate. The more pressing issue is how to punish Iran for the shameless patency of those prevarications. And the most pressing issue of all is how to stop the Iranian race to nuclear arms.

In light of the darkening news about Iran, the United States appears determined to lead the international effort for a fourth round of UN sanctions against Tehran. Even Russia may be willing now to join in the American-led effort.

The Canadian government has minced no words regarding the threat posed by Tehran. Two weeks ago, after Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad announced an increase in his country's uranium enrichment effort, Prime Minister Stephen Harper called on Iran to halt enrichment of its uranium.

"It is time for Iran to end its defiance of the international community, suspend its enrichment activity and take immediate steps toward transparency and compliance by halting the construction of new enrichment sites and fully co-operating with the International Atomic Energy Agency," Harper said.

The prime minister took pains to differentiate between the government and the people of Iran. "While we are concerned about the regime in Tehran, our solidarity, for Canadians, is with the great Iranian people who continue to suffer terrible rights abuses, and our solidarity is with them going forward," Harper said. Foreign Affairs Minister Lawrence Cannon elaborated upon the prime minister's promise to take advantage of Canada's G8 presidency at the meeting of the group in Gatineau, Que., in late March to focus world attention on Iran.

"Canada and the international community will not accept the regime's latest moves, which bring Iran considerably closer to possessing weapons-grade material," Cannon said. "Iran must suspend its enrichment activity and take immediate steps toward transparency and compliance."

To its credit, Canada understands that the spectre of a nuclear-armed Iran is not simply a problem for Israel, the country its leaders have said should be "wiped from the map." The regime in Tehran threatens the peace and the stability of the entire world. Perhaps Canada can lead the G8 to an effective, international response on Iran?

25 years ago in The CJN

Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres ended a two-day visit to Rome by saying that he would welcome King Hussein of Jordan in Jerusalem and offering to go to Amman for peace talks. Peres made the comments at a press conference with Italian prime minister Bettino Craxi. Peres also had a 40-minute meeting with Pope John Paul II, in which they discussed the Middle East and Jewish-Christian relations.

Don't bash haredim

As satisfying as it may feel to some, we won't achieve Jewish unity by bashing haredim and Orthodoxy ("Minority decides who makes a good Jew" and "Ruth's conversion not valid today," letters, Feb 11). The importance of the conversion issue pales in comparison to the issue of Jewish survival in the face of assimilation and intermarriage. Thousands enter the Jewish People through the conversion door yearly, while hundreds of thousands are quietly slipping out the back door. Tellingly, those streams of Judaism that have watered down their conversion standards are the ones who are losing Jews the fastest.

There is a deeper meaning and purpose to being Jewish that goes beyond being persecuted together or being a mutual benefit society, even in aid of such good causes as supporting Israel. We don't make Judaism more attractive or durable in the long run by loosening the connection with that meaning and purpose. Maybe we should ask if we could actually learn something from those segments of Judaism that have been successful in inculcating in the majority of their children a driving passion for living an observant Jewish life, committed to Jewish values, including the universal global vision that is part of the package.

Many approaches to Judaism

The Feb. 4 edition included a warning by Rabbi Michael Melchior about a "conversion catastrophe" and an eloquent plea for reasonableness by Rabbi Reuven Bulka ("Rabbi warns of conversion 'catastrophe'" and "Some observations on the conversion crisis"). They are right! For better or worse, the tiny world Jewish community approaches Judaism in many different ways. A large majority of Israel's Jews are secular, for example. No Jew has the right to force his or her way of doing things on other Jews or the community at large. In the case of Israel, this results from some decisions made around the founding of the state that have serious consequences today. At some point, a national unity coalition will have to be formed and will have to reform the electoral system, abandoning the purely proportional system that allows a tiny haredi tail to wag the national dog.

In Montreal, reason and goodwill usually prevail. When the directors of the YM-YWHA decided to open to some extent on Shabbat, compromises were made, but their attempt to serve the full community, rather than just the Orthodox, prevailed. The non-Orthodox communities, of which I am a member, are now more willing to stand up for our rights. Now, even modern Orthodox clergy are in the uncomfortable position of having to oppose haredi actions.

Ruth's conversion is valid today

David Gabay wrote that in the Tanach, Naomi, Ruth's mother-in-law accepted Ruth's conversion to Judaism based solely on Ruth's famous words: "Your people shall be my people, and your God my God" ("Ruth's conversion not valid today," letters, Feb. 11) Gabay uses this as proof of Ruth's speedy conversion and takes our rabbis to task for not being more lenient in accepting potential converts.

The Talmud says in Yevamot 47 that we learn from the story of Naomi and Ruth the necessity for the convert to commit him or herself to all the commandments of the Torah. The Talmud says that Ruth, in response to Naomi's assertion that to be a Jew one must keep all 613 commandments, responded, "Your people are my people." (Ruth 1:16) According to Rav Yitzchak Arieli, co-founder and mashgiach at Yeshivat Merkaz HaRav in Jerusalem, we see from Ruth's response that Jewish peoplehood is synonymous with keeping the commandments. To join the Jewish People while not accepting the entire package deal of 613 commandments has no basis in Jewish jurisprudence, and anyone who does so cannot be classified as a Jewish convert.

BJCC closure

The article about the closure of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre reveals only the tip of the iceberg. Despite the brand new daycare, our children's needs have been overlooked, and the new building is both difficult to access physically and lacking affordable family programs ("With BJCC closed, members have new fitness routines," health supplement, Feb. 4). Without the large, sunny lobby, children's museum, art gallery, cafeteria and drop-in Shabbat and holiday programs – including the free programs held every year on Dec. 25 – there is little to attract families with young kids.

The story of the Book of Esther: an analysis

The following text was recently discovered among ancient manuscripts and smuggled out of Tehran.

By ANONYMOUS

Translated from ancient Persian
by Curt Leviant

Our community of Jews here in Shushan, Persia, has just had the pleasure of reading the newly written account of events that occurred last year, in 350 BCE, in our capital city and in surrounding towns in the kingdom of Achashverosh: how an evil man, Haman, rose up against us; and, with the help of Mordechai and Queen Esther, we were able to defeat him and all our enemies and make merry on the great day which we now call Purim.

This wonderful scroll, megillah in Hebrew, or the Book of Esther, has circulated widely, and I now offer you my view of this narrative.

The Book of Esther is an outstanding example of storytelling and will surely find a place in every Jewish household. The tale contains all the timeless literary devices which we Persian Jews love so much: a well-made plot, conflict and suspense, dramatic irony, believable characters, foreshadowing and a harmonious structure.

At the opening royal feast, we meet Achashverosh, the mighty king of Persia and see how hastily he disposes of his wife, Queen Vashti, when she disobeys him, foreshadowing the similar dispatch with which he later orders the Jews condemned to death.

Our king does not enjoy being lonely, so he must have a queen. (At this point, I must modestly say that I gave him the suggestion for a beauty contest.) Once it is announced, our lovely Esther – advised by her uncle and guardian, Mordechai, not to reveal her Jewishness – wins and marries the monarch. Soon Mordechai (end of Chapter 2), a minor court official, unearths an assassination plot against the king. Instead of informing Achashverosh directly, Mordechai instructs Esther to bring the news. Thus both Mordechai and Esther can win favour with the ruler.

Mordechai's discovery, inscribed in the king's Book of Chronicles, is pertinent to the story's development.

The main protagonists – the foolish king, the lovely Esther, the wise Mordechai – have made their appearance. Now, for conflict and tension, enter the villain, Haman, in Chapter 3. Everyone must bow to him, but Mordechai refuses. When Haman realizes that Mordechai does not bow because he is a Jew, he plans to destroy all the Jews. Lots – purim in Hebrew – are cast, and the pre-spring month of Adar is chosen.

To vent his hatred against one recalcitrant Jew, why should Haman want to kill all the Jews? But since earlier in the story, one woman's action prompted a law for all women, a precedent has been set for mass retaliation for an individual's misdemeanour.

Since the insubordinate Mordechai is Jewish, Haman infers that the entire Jewish People are disobedient, and moreover, their "laws are different" (3:8). Haman persuades the king by promising to give a great deal of silver to the royal treasury – booty from the slain Jews.

The chapter concludes: "The king and Haman sat down to drink, but the city of Shushan was perplexed..." (3:15) – a hint that people in our great city realized that a wrong had been committed against the Jews.

In contrast to the opening moods of revelry, Chapter 4 begins with mourning and pathos. Mordechai tells Esther of the coming disaster and asks her to intercede. Fearing for her own life, she hesitates, for no one may come before the king uninvited, on pain of death. Mordechai counters that the fate of Esther and the Jews is one. If she remains silent now, salvation will come from elsewhere; and perhaps it is for this very reason that Esther has been made queen.

Esther asks the Jews in Shushan to fast for three days, after which she will go to the king. Here, at mid-point in the story (5:2), when Esther is before the king, the reversal starts: the heroes' rise, and the villain Haman's fall, commence.

But Esther does not state her request immediately. That evening, she prepares a banquet for the king, Haman and herself. She postpones her appeal until the following day, when all three will dine again. This artful postponement adds suspense and permits the inclusion of yet another strand in the story.

After Esther's invitation, we read that Haman was happy (5:9) – a wonderful bit of dramatic irony, for the villain does not suspect that his downfall is imminent. Interestingly, each of the male protagonists has a woman involved with plot movement: King Achashverosh-

Vashti, Mordechai-Esther, Haman-Zeresh. Haman takes his wife's suggestion to prepare a high gallows for Mordechai.

The craft of good narrative demands that some strands that later intersect should at first be left dangling. Three appear at the beginning of Chapter 6: Can Esther save the Jews at the banquet? Will Haman hang Mordechai? Has Mordechai's service to the king been forgotten?

The writer picks up strand number 3. A few hours after having dined with Esther, the insomniac king calls for the Book of Chronicles and realizes that Mordechai has not been adequately rewarded for saving his life. The king asks who is in the court. Fortunately, it is Haman, about to request that Mordechai be hanged for treason. At this moment, the villain and hero are at delicious cross-purposes.

The king asks Haman how to bestow honours upon a deserving man. The vain Haman, assuming he's being considered, suggests something grand: that man should ride, royally clad, on horseback, throughout Shushan, while all praise him.

"Then do so to Mordechai," the king tells Haman. And Haman, so high-spirited the previous day, hastens home in mourning (6:12).

Now Zeresh changes her mind. "Since Mordechai is a Jew," she tells Haman, "you don't have a ghost of a chance." At once, the king's messenger enters and hastens Haman to Esther's second banquet.

Note that this little section begins with Haman hastening home (6:12), and concludes with his being hastened away. Another example of the story's irony is these carefully chosen words, a tongue-in-cheek parallel to the speed with which the couriers "hastened" (3:15) to spread the edict for the Jews' destruction.

At the second banquet, Esther petitions for the lives of her people. The king asks who the perpetrator of the crime is. Esther points to Haman. Achashverosh, enraged, leaves. Haman falls on Esther's couch to beg for mercy. When the king returns, he assumes Haman is attacking the queen and orders Haman hanged on the gallows built for Mordechai.

At the close of the narrative, the villain has been destroyed, but the evil he has set into motion must be stopped. But Persian law states that a royal edict cannot be recalled. The most the king can do is to give the Jews the right of self-defence. Again, the couriers hasten to deliver the news.

Haste and speed are elements in the latter part of this tale. During the first half of the Book of Esther, time moves at a leisurely pace. The beginning is either measured in months – the 180-day banquet, the 12 months of purification during the beauty contest – or in indefinite time gaps. Gradually, however, time becomes compressed. When Esther decides to go to the king, time is measured by days. From then on, events follow not by the day, but by the hour. Action occurs swiftly around the clock.

Afternoon: Esther before the king.
Evening: the first banquet.
Night: The king's insomnia.
Middle of the night: Haman in the king's chamber.
Morning: Honouring of Mordechai.
Noontime: The crucial second banquet.
Afternoon: Haman's demise, the new edict in favour of the Jews. Mordechai becomes the king's right-hand man.

Ironic reversal is a favourite literary device of the author. Haman comes to bury Mordechai, not to praise him, yet ends up honouring, not hanging him. The very gallows prepared for Mordechai are used to hang Haman. The Jews' day of doom turns into a day of joy. Whereas before "Shushan was perplexed," now our city "Shushan rejoiced."

In Chapter 9, the story ends. The Jews defend themselves and are victorious. To the end of the tale an epilogue is appended. Purim is established as a holiday for all time, a day "of fasting and joy, and of sending portions to another and gifts to the poor." (9:22)

In our story, all the characters act of their own volition. Inner human drives move them. Unlike other biblical stories, there is no deus ex machina. Not only is God not mentioned in the Book of Esther – the only book in the Bible without the word "God" – there is no hint of any supernatural force.

The book opens with feasting and joy in Shushan and in the palace; it concludes with feasting and joy for the Jews of the realm. Upon this artistically harmonious note concludes the Book of Esther, one of the most perfect narratives in the Bible.

As a child, Curt Leviant, author of A Novel of Klass, spoke ancient Persian fluently. Today he can barely say hello.

Opinions

Esther's lesson for us

On the holiday of Purim we read the story of Esther. It's a wonderful narrative, filled with the threat of annihilation, a beauty pageant, parties, murder, evil ministers, subplots and hangings. True to all such adventures, the people win out – that is, our people win. We survive and Queen Esther and her cousin are victorious.

Sarma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Many lessons are embedded in this tale, including the importance of the hiddenness of God. So as we prepare to celebrate, to put on our costumes or dress up our children, I call on you, the adults of Canada's Jewish communities, to heed some of the lessons, those hidden and not so hidden.

First of all, let's note that Esther is the hero. She is presented to us as much more than a beautiful maiden. At first obedient, she assumes leadership when Mordechai reminds her that she must stand up for her people. She does. Willingly and courageously, she takes on the mantle and responsibility of leadership

So please stand for her as the Megillah reports her heroic statement, "If I die, I die!" She goes before the king, unbidden, prepared to die but eager to contend with Haman for her people's survival.

She plots a strategy that eventually topples Haman, winning the heart of her capricious king. She stands alone with the weight of the Jews of Persia on her shoulders. But before she undertakes such a serious commitment, she prepares with fasting and prayer. And even before that she seeks one requisite ingredient. Not only must she and her retinue fast in preparation for this momentous responsibility, but the whole community of Shushan must join them. Everyone must fast.

When there's a crisis, it's everyone's responsibility to act, not just the leader's. That's the lesson Esther teaches us. All must act. Perhaps that's the purpose of God's absence in the Megillah. At this point in time, it's our job to act, our imperative. We act on this earth as God's representatives.

On the fast of Esther, on Purim, dedicate yourselves to community action. And not just in any arena.

Find an agunah – a woman who can't get her Jewish divorce. Help her. I have written before about the plight of agunot. We have too many women who are left alone in their struggle to obtain their freedom from recalcitrant men. Women chained to dead marriages. Women waiting for your help. Ask your rabbis what they're doing to help agunot. Ask your neighbours. Ask yourselves. Do something.

The Purim story is an immigrant story

Last month I wrote about the immigrant experience. This issue of The CJN goes out for the holiday of Purim. Talk about the immigrant experience! There is Esther Hadassah, a Jewish exile living in Persia, who rises to become queen of the kingdom. Now that's an immigrant success story.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Success stories abound, but let's not forget how hard it may be to get there. It was long thought that immigrants would reach equivalence with their native-born peers in about five years. That is, it took five years to reach the same income level as longtime Canadian citizens from whatever their initial income level was. The 2001 census showed, however, that the period of time was now 10, not five, years, and many immigrants remain at sub-standard income levels for even longer. That goes for Jewish and non-Jewish immigrants.

We need to be aware of this struggle, since we're called upon to help those newcomers who will eventually enrich the lives of all Canadians.

One can also perish from success. Jews coming to Canada find that we now enjoy a status, income level, educational achievement and social acceptance that means we can go anywhere, be anything and, in fact, largely disappear into the mainstream.

Which brings us back to Esther. The story – surely an Arabian-nights inspired folk tale – opens with the Jews of Persia sitting pretty, safe, secure and even using the secular names of the people around them. Esther equals Astarte, the goddess of fertility and plenty. Maybe her teudah, her identity card, says Hadassah, but who would know?

Our own beauty becomes queen of Persia, and only when Haman darkens the doorway to success of the Jews does it seem to matter that she is Hadassah, not Esther.

Recently, at a morning minyan breakfast I attend, the topic of the influx of Sri Lankan boat people, who had recently arrived and were claiming refugee status, was raised. Tempers didn't exactly flare, but a lively discussion ensued. The question: whether to let in refugees who had "jumped the queue," no matter what hardships they were fleeing. No doubt the same discussion will erupt when considering relief for Haitians in the wake of the recent catastrophic earthquake there.

OK, all those Jews who are First Nations please raise your hand. No? Then my fellow immigrants, you are here by virtue of your parents', grandparents', great-grandparents' decisions to leave there and come here. You are reaping the benefits of their trip across the plains of Ukraine, the deserts of Africa, the crowded cities of Europe, the turmoil of South Africa, or the hostility of Muslim or Christian neighbours. Did everyone have a legal entry visa? No? Or – even more frowned upon – perhaps they were "economic refugees" coming here for a better and safer life.

My ancestors came to America in the holds of stinking sailing ships before the American Revolution. Some were mercenary Hessian soldiers hired by George III and captured by Washington at Trenton. They came and stayed because here was better than there. My husband's family came here because there was more violent (something about a Russian Revolution) or more dangerous (Poland in 1920) than whatever they would find on this side of the ocean.

Thank God their great-grandchildren are here, since there is now a vast graveyard.

Our minyan discussion was not very logical. But it did tell me something: that we soon forget how we came to be sitting in warmth and safety. Indeed, I have heard people involved with Jewish immigrant resettlement in Canada say, "Why pay for their [meaning Jewish immigrants] resettlement here? Let them all go to Israel."

Esther, too, thought she was home safe and free, until the moment of challenge came. "Who knows?" says Mordechai. "Maybe God put you here for just such a moment as this."

We don't know why we were put here, or what will come of welcoming refugees from tortured lands. Maybe it's for the time when a new challenge to our fine democracy will rise up and we all will be needed?

Olympics in Israel?

The Vancouver 2010 Winter Olympics are a source of pride for all Canadians. We collectively celebrate the breathtaking beauty of Canada's West Coast, the hospitality of its residents, its organizers and, of course, our own dedicated athletes and the many athletes from abroad.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Hosting Olympic competitions is not new to Canada. We experienced the Montreal Summer Games in 1976 and the Calgary Winter Games in 1988.

The thought occurred to me – would it be possible for Israel to host a summer olympiad in either Jerusalem or Tel Aviv? Every four years, Israel successfully hosts the Maccabiah, the third-largest sporting event in the world.

Yet, one cannot envision the International Olympic Committee ever accepting a bid from either of those cities for fear of a boycott, or worse, from the same nations that constantly berate and criticize Israel in the United Nations and in other forums, be they political, academic or scientific.

For example, Canadian universities are criticized for hiring Israeli academics, and prestigious British medical journals are averse to publishing articles by leading Israeli researchers.

But the Olympics are about sport and a spirit of international cohesion. Supposedly, they are not about politics. To say politics play no role in the Olympic movement is patently untrue. Hosting the Olympic Games is a vehicle for fostering national prides, itself a form of political expression.

We saw that, for example, in Beijing. And in order to pressure South Africa to end official apartheid, that country was excluded from virtually all international sporting events until 1991. We witnessed the 1980 American boycott of the Moscow Olympics arising out of the Russian intervention in Afghanistan. And we can recall the historical travesty of the infamous Berlin Games, at which the glorification of Nazism was a paramount feature of that event.

One does not have to focus on the Olympics to see how international sporting events can frequently become forums for political (and arguably, anti-Semitic) sentiment when Israeli athletes are involved. For example, Swiss activists disrupted Israeli participation in a qualifying event during the 2007 World Cup soccer competition. During the past year, we witnessed pressure on FIFA (the World Cup organizers) by several nations to exclude Israel from future competition; the unwelcoming reception of the Israeli Davis Cup team in Murcia, Spain, for an international tennis competition; the call for a boycott against the presence of the Israeli national basketball team in Zaragoza, Spain; and, not surprisingly, the denial of a visa for an Israeli tennis player to permit participation in a tournament in Dubai.

Notwithstanding all these affronts to the State of Israel, they all pale by comparison to the horrific murders of Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich Olympics, commonly referred to as the Munich massacre.

When it comes to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, there are essentially two categories of people or groups critical of Israel. There are some genuine supporters of the Palestinian cause. But there are also others who are part of a well-organized, international campaign to destroy Israel and use every possible opportunity to pursue their sinister objective.

Most dramatically, we saw them "hijack" the 2001 United Nations World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, utilizing a modus operandi that has become a standard ploy at many international events. Many of those who participate in this world campaign to vilify Israel are plain and simply anti-Semitic. They are advocates of the so-called "new" anti-Semitism. Under the guise of support for the Palestinian cause, criticism of Israel is a thinly veiled coverup of blatant anti-Jewish hatred.

Practically speaking, an Olympics in Israel would entail a massive security undertaking. And an Olympics in Jerusalem would compound the difficulty with respect to the disputed sovereignty over east Jerusalem. But the main obstacle would be the internationally organized, unfair, one-sided and hateful condemnation of Israel. So, it would surprise no one that a bid to hold the Olympics in Israel would be doomed to failure.

The possibility of an Israeli-hosted Olympics is probably the furthest thing from the minds of observers at the Vancouver Games. Sadly, it is unlikely that the Olympic flame will illuminate the sky over an Israeli city.

The Kirshner File

Iran is militant and pragmatic

That Iran under President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has hegemonic ambitions in the Middle East is hardly earthshaking news. Since time immemorial, Persian dynasties, including the Pahlavi monarchy, which was overthrown by the Islamic revolution 31 years ago this month, have attempted to dominate the region. And now, in a replay of past practices, Ahmadinejad is attempting to extend Iran's influence through surrogates – Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Gaza Strip – and through its enduring alliance with Syria.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

As a result, observes Ray Takeyh in Guardians of the Revolution: Iran and the World in the Age of the Ayatollahs (Oxford University Press), a book of great depth and range, Iran has emerged as a "pivotal power" in the Mideast. "The goal of dominance and hegemony that eluded previous Persian rulers seems within grasp," he writes. "Tehran's determination to sustain its nuclear program, its quest to evict U.S. forces from Iraq, and its holding aloft the banner of resistance against Israel are all means of asserting its regional influence."

Iran, a nation whose borders have been breached by a succession of invasions, the last one having been launched by Iraq in 1980, is suspicious of neighbours and foreign powers that have coveted its territory.

But since 1979, Iran's foreign policy, suffused with power politics, religious fervour and historical grievances, but leavened by pragmatism and a careful calibration of national interests, has regarded itself as a "vanguard state" whose Islamic revolution transcends fixed boundaries.

The first spiritual leader of the new Iran, Ayatollah Khomeini, who died in 1989, tried to export its revolutionary ideals, but his neighbours rejected his theocratic model of governance, not only placing Iran at odds with the international community, but leaving Iran as something of a pariah.

His successors, Muhammed Hashemi Rafsanjani and Muhammed Khatami, attempted to tone down Iranian policy. Nonetheless, they recoiled from challenging hardliners or pressing ahead with their program of change. The current president, Ahmadinejad, has been the most reactionary of the lot, regularly denouncing the United States and Israel and denying the Holocaust.

Ahmadinejad has taken his cues from Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khameni, who has contemptuously described Israel as "a fabricated and fake state."

As Takeyh suggests, the one consistent, overriding theme in Iran's policy has been identifying Israel as an enemy of Islam and a state that must be eradicated: "Khomeini's hostility to Israel was not a cynical strategy but an essential and enduring pillar of his ideology."

Even a relative moderate like Khatami, who espoused "dialogue among civilizations" and promoted a good neighbour policy in an effort to ease tensions with the West, lambasted Israel as a racist entity and claimed that the Arab-Israeli peace process was bound to fail.

Takeyh, a former adviser to U.S. President Barack Obama and now a senior fellow for Middle Eastern studies at the Council of Foreign Relations, says that Iran's antagonism to Israel has basically defined its policy in the Mideast and led it to make common cause with radical states such as Syria and militant organizations such as Hezbollah.

He notes that Iran's strident opposition to Israel marks a departure in Iranian policy, since Iran forged close economic and security relations with Israel from the 1950s onward.

But even as their relationship grew, Shiite seminaries in Iran continued to be hotbeds of anti-Zionist rhetoric, he points out in a timely reminder of the fact that Israel's ties with Iran were unpopular on a grassroots level.

The clerical class often agitated against Israel, calling for a boycott of Israeli goods and denouncing the establishment of diplomatic relations. During Khomeini's years in exile, he continuously branded Israel as an enemy of Islam and a sinister agent of American imperialism. And on the eve of his return to Iran in 1979, he declared, "We must rise up, destroy Israel, and replace it with the heroic nation of Palestine."

Khomeini sensed Zionist conspiracies everywhere, claiming that "the independence of [Iran's] court and [its] economy have fallen into the hands of the Zionists." Of course, as Takeyh observes, Khomeini was probably referring to "Jews" rather than to "Zionists."

Although Iranian spokesmen have since gone to great lengths to differentiate between Iran's animosity toward Israel and its respect for Judaism, Khomeini's writings were peppered with anti-Semitic themes.

In his seminal book, Hukumat-i-Islami, the blueprint of the theocratic entity he envisaged, Khomeini wrote, "Since its inception, the Islamic movement has been afflicted with Jews, for it was they who first established anti-Islamic propaganda."

One of Khomeini's oft-repeated accusations was that the shah, Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, had allowed Iranian Jews to "infiltrate" key sectors of society and "control" the economy. "Khomeini's indisputable anti-Semitism was not a passing phenomenon," Takeyh writes. "It has become a pillar of Iran's Islamist ideology."

Iran's animus toward Israel notwithstanding, the Islamic Republic has had direct dealings with Israel when it was convenient. The Iran-Contra affair was a case in point: Israel's eagerness to sell arms to Iran converged with the United States' desire to free its hostages in Lebanon. The affair gave Israel a golden opportunity to weaken Iraq, one of its mortal enemies, as Iraq and Iran fought an eight-year war from 1980 to 1988.

In an example of unbridled expediency, Iran made it clear that its acquisition of Israeli weapons – TOW missiles and spare parts for Hawk anti-aircraft batteries – should not be taken as a sign of its recognition of Israel.

During Iran's protracted war with Iraq, the United States funnelled vital intelligence data and financial credits to Iraq to ensure that Iran would lose so as not be in a position to dominate the Persian Gulf.

Washington's pro-Iraqi tilt, as well as its subsequent "dual containment" policy of Iraq and Iran, had the effect of deepening Iran's suspicion of the United States, better known as the Great Satan in Iranian ruling circles.

To the mullahs, the United States is a formidable threat not only because of its regional ambitions and its historic interference in Iranian affairs, but also because of the lure of its democratic ideals and seductive culture.

And yet, as Takeyh adds, Iranian and U.S. interests converged after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist events in the United States.

Both nations opposed the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and regarded the Taliban as an adversary. After the United States invaded Afghanistan, Iran offered its co-operation. But the Karine A incident on Jan. 3, 2002, in which a shipful of Iranian arms bound for the Palestinian Authority was intercepted by the Israeli Navy, hardened Washington's skeptical attitude toward Tehran.

Iran's attempt to come to terms with the United States on a broad range of issues, as outlined in a 2003 proposal known as the "grand bargain," fizzled after the Bush administration learned that Islamic terrorists who had blown up a U.S. housing complex in Saudi Arabia were based in Iran.

Takeyh believes that containment cannot check Iran's growing influence in the region. In his view, dialogue, or engagement, is the most sensible way to convince Iran to adhere to international norms and commit to regional stability. As he puts it, "Ultimately, security for Arabs and Israelis will be more achievable if Iran is part of the region… rather than excluded from it."

Judging by its rejection of a aestern proposal to swap much of its enriched uranium for medical-reactor fuel and Ahmadinejad's recent boast that Iran is now a "nuclear state," Iran disdains genuine engagement.

On Purim, read, eat and make noise.

Purim is a time to recall the courage of Esther and Mordechai. To read the Megilla, to celebrate by feasting and drinking and, of course, to make lots of noise when we hear the name Haman the villain. Finally, there is misloach manot or tzedakah – the sharing of food or money with those who are poor.

The partners managing the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund wish you and your family a very Happy Purim. Let us celebrate, but most of all, let us be grateful for our good fortune.

Bracelets create bonds for Reena volunteers, clients

By STEPHEN SWEET
Special to The CJN

It was an afternoon of beads, bracelets and learning at the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre on Feb. 14.

Reena clients and New Leadership division volunteers worked together to make bracelets to be sold at the Not Just Another Saturday Night fundraiser, which will take place on March 27 this year. The New Leadership group are volunteers aged 25-50, who work for Reena and the Reena Foundation.

Sheri Becker, New Leadership executive member and volunteer co-ordinator, saw this as a great opportunity to bring the two groups together.

"Our goal is to integrate New Leadership volunteers with the clients to make what we're fundraising for a reality," Becker said.

Making the bracelets with the clients gave the volunteers an opportunity to get to know first-hand the people they support.

"It's easy to raise money, but when you don't know where your money is going to, it doesn't feel real," Becker said. "This event makes it real, and it gives [the volunteers] a chance to see where the money and their efforts are going."

The bracelets, which will be sold at the event for $25, grew out of an idea that Becker and other volunteers came up with in the previous year.

"Last year, we started a program where we wanted to involve some of the clients in the actual event," said Adam Henechowicz, co-founder of New Leadership and a member of the Reena Foundation's board of directors.

For the 2009 Not Just Another Saturday Night, the clients, with the help of volunteers, made paintings to sell at the event.

"This year, we didn't want to repeat the same thing we did last year, so we thought of a different arts and crafts activity to involve the clients," Henechowicz said.

"Making bracelets seemed like a very creative alternative."

Staff member Lisa Cohen helps Reena client Adam Whaley make a bracelet. The bracelets will be sold at Not Just Another Saturday Night, the Reena Foundation's fundraising event to be held March 27. [Stephen Sweet photo]

They'll serve an extra purpose this year, too, he said. "Normally, we get teddy bears donated to us and sell those for the prizes. Each bear will have a corresponding number with it, for a guaranteed prize.

"But this year, we thought that if Reena clients made the sellable items, it might be more of an incentive for people to buy them."

Becker was pleased with the clients' success at making the bracelets.

"It went way better than we had expected," she said. "It's a very fine motor activity, and we were worried it might be frustrating, but the clients really enjoyed it and kept looking to make more.

"We really managed to capture their attention."

A sense of accomplishment is important for the clients.

"They're very structured, and… go by a strict schedule," Becker said. "Knowing that they've accomplished this is a very big thing for them."

Helping produce the final product was a great experience for the volunteers, too.

"This has been my first activity with Reena, and I think it went really well," said Heley Taitlbaum, who recently joined the New Leadership group. "I feel like it really brings all of our work to life."

She even acquired an admirer. "One of the clients gave me a kiss because I helped them," Taitlbaum said. "It was very sweet."

The afternoon was an opportunity for the volunteers to learn a little more about the people they're raising money for.

"It's a great chance for the volunteers to know how they're helping the Reena clients in their day-to-day activities," Henechowicz said. "It's a great way to expose them to this population.

"A lot of volunteers don't have any previous experience working with this group, and this is a positive, easy and sociable way to do it."

Five years later, Hariri murder probe goes nowhere

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Early last week, the media's foreign affairs gaze was fixed on the way Iran marked the 31st anniversary of Iran's Islamic Revolution – in particular, its increasingly repressive domination of its citizens and its open defiance of the international community over its nuclear program.

Almost entirely overlooked was another anniversary in the Middle East: the fifth anniversary of the assassination of Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri.

CBC Radio's Feb. 14 World Report was an exception. It featured a news report by freelancer Ben Gilbert in Beirut. After describing what he called "a pretty festive atmosphere" in which, under tight security control, thousands of people paraded down a street chanting and singing and holding pictures of Hariri and his son Saad, the current prime minister, Gilbert turned his attention to what's become of the investigation into Hariri's murder.

He noted that even though Saad Hariri, along with his coalition partners, had accused Syria of killing his father, especially after initial indications pointed to Syria's culpability, Saad this year travelled to Damascus and met with Syrian President Bashar Assad. "That was seen as a big compromise," Gilbert said.

As to the UN investigation, Gilbert added that it "has pretty much gone nowhere… Three different [UN] investigators have been head of this investigation and nothing concrete has come out of it, yet."

In "A UN Betrayal in Beirut" (New York Times, Feb. 14), Michael Young, the opinion editor of the Beirut Daily Star, provided additional details and was bluntly critical about the UN's failure to make any headway in this case.

Young began his piece by reminding readers that the Hariri assassination launched the "Cedar Revolution" in Lebanon, forced Syria to withdraw its army from the country and led the UN Security Council to investigate the murder. The initial investigation team in 2005 was led by Detlev Mehlis, a German prosecutor, whose first report pointed a finger at Syria's involvement.

Young wrote that by the end of that year, when Mehlis stepped down, "he felt he had enough to arrest at least one of the [Syrian] intelligence officers" and to name other suspects. Four Lebanese intelligence officials suspected of involvement were already being held in custody.

However, under Mehlis' successor, Belgian judge Serge Brammertz, the investigation quickly withered, even though it had been upgraded to a "special tribunal" near the Hague. Brammertz stepped down at the end of 2007.

According to Young things went from bad to worse: "More disturbing, the United Nations itself has remained silent, even though Mr. Brammertz's successor, Daniel Bellemare of Canada, has suffered his own setbacks. Last April, despite having acquired prosecutorial powers, he was forced by the tribunal's bylaws to release the imprisoned [Lebanese] suspects pending an indictment. Mr. Bellemare deserves blame for taking on such a weak case in the first place, effectively legitimizing his predecessor's shoddy work. But the onus surely lies with Mr. Brammertz, and with those at United Nations headquarters who never held him to account."

The sharp decline in the UN investigation was followed by changes in the region that also made Lebanon less inclined to pursue Syria in this case. According to Young, Saad Hariri's meeting with Assad last year came about as result of pressure Hariri was under from his backer, Saudi Arabia, which was attempting to reconcile with Syria, in large part, it may be assumed, to lessen Iran's influence over Damascus.

In the meantime, Syria has been reasserting its power in Lebanon, and although Young didn't mention this, Syria has been emboldened by Iran's backing and its support of Hezbollah. This development has led to recent heated exchanges between Israel and Syria over the increased threat Jerusalem sees coming from Hezbollah's heavy re-arming by Iran and Syria (in violation of UN Security Council resolutions).

Even though Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has tried to calm the waters by speaking about the need for peace, Assad has maintained a belligerent posture warning Israel about the consequences of any "aggression against Hezbollah."

Tensions remain strong on Israel's northern border, even while the United States plans to nominate Robert Ford, a career diplomat, to become the first U.S. ambassador to Damascus since 2005.

Community comes together to celebrate UJA 2010 Campaign

Campaign expected to reach $64 million

By Daniel Horowitz

More than 700 members of Toronto's Jewish community recently helped United Jewish Appeal celebrate its Campaign 2010 closing with an evening that featured something for everyone.

The February 16th event, held at Events on the Park, featured a keynote address by Dan Senor, co-author of Start-Up Nation: The Story of Israel's Economic Miracle.

The event also featured mentalist Haim Goldenberg, and The Midway State, a Toronto band known for their unique blend of rock, piano and soulful lyrics.

The 2010 Campaign, chaired by Debbie Kimel and Ken Tanenbaum, which, despite the economy, attracted an impressive 2,100 new donors to the UJA fold, is projected to reach $64 million when the final count is completed.

"Debbie and I are keenly aware that although this is the end of the line for us as chairs, there is still much to be done," said Tanenbaum. "But, from everything we've learned about our incredible Jewish community over the last year, we can say with confidence that Jewish Toronto will continue to come together for those in need here in our city, in Israel and around the world."

"Your UJA campaign dollars change so many lives," Kimel told the audience. "Everything we accomplished this year could never have happened without all of you. Your support, compassion, generosity and plain hard work, literally moved mountains, making Campaign 2010 such a success in particularly challenging times."

Addressing the various attempts made by Israel's detractors to delegitimize the Jewish state, Senor told the audience that Israel's own success was the best blow to her enemies.

"The campaign to delegitimize Israel and whether or not Israel has a right to have a place among the nations is quite real," he said. "There is no greater blow to this campaign than to remind the world that it has a lot to learn from Israel. One of the lessons the world needs to learn is how Israel built this innovation entrepreneurship hothouse; this incubator that is transforming the world. The West needs innovation and Israel's got it."

One of the most moving moments of the evening was a brief address made by Ketty Jean Batiste, a Haitian woman who now calls Toronto home. Batiste was grateful to Toronto's Jewish community, which has raised approximately $850,000 through UJA's Hope for Haiti Relief Fund.

"We finally reached members of our family four days after the hurricane struck my beloved country of Haiti," she said. "They described the scene as people sleeping on the streets and in cars; of human cries coming out from beneath piles of rubble; and little children walking aimlessly, with no parents in sight, possibly already orphaned, as the only world they knew crumbled around them. I feel blessed to be part of a community made up of caring, compassionate and generous Jewish people, all of whom have gone out of their way to help my people, total strangers to all of you."

Every life has a story worth telling

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto – the endowment development program of UJA Federation – created its Book of Life initiative in 2003 in order to record the inspiring stories of donors who have chosen to leave a legacy for the future of Toronto's Jewish community.

Legacies are left by opening an endowment fund or making a gift through a bequest in your will or life insurance.

We encourage you to read some of the stories and get a glimpse into the minds and lives of our many supporters – stories that make our Book of Life a timeless document.

The stories, one of which is printed below, can be read on-line at www.bookoflife.ca.

For more information about how you can include your story in the Book of Life, please call Janice Benatar at 416-631-5847.

By Morris Saffer, Dodi Weill and Jacqueline Markowitz

Our parents, Minnie and Harry Saffer z"l, shared an encompassing love for one another and for their family and community. This abiding love is the blessing our parents bestowed upon us; their eternal legacy that we will hold close to our hearts and treasure always.

Dodi Weill and Morris Saffer

At the core of every piece of their life stories stands an everlasting and unrelenting love for their children and for family. A love that persevered through the loss of our father when he was only sixty years old, and a love that embraced our mother, sheltered her children, and withstood the loss of our brother, John z"l.

That love, like a prayer shawl, wraps around our shoulders now; the fringes are our children, and our children's children…our continuance. As the tallis is folded and placed in a velvet pouch, its essence remains at the core of our souls; the silk and tassels softening and becoming more precious over the years.

We each have poignant memories of Friday nights, where we would gather at our parents' table. The light of the candles cradled within our mother's hands as she sang the blessing; the look in our father's eyes as he sat proudly at the head of the table. These were enchanting moments, and ones that rooted our lives and made us understand the significance of our heritage, of family, and of community.

May this endowment flourish in their memory and act as a legacy for their thirteen grandchildren and fifteen great grandchildren.

Israel's secret weapon: democracy

By ISRAEL DUBINSKY AND JAY BRODBAR
Special to The CJN

Throughout Israel's history, we have had to be mindful of external attacks on its existence. In addition to a brave defence force, Israel's vibrant democratic society has also been a source of strength. However, recently we have been witness to concerted internal attacks intended to delegitimize and undermine this very source of strength: the fabric of democratic society. These internal attacks are not new, but in trying to use the processes of government to intimidate members of Israel's human rights community, the attackers have adopted a new and alarming strategy.

Guest Voice

These attacks target civil and human rights organizations in Israel, ranging from those fighting for religious pluralism to others who work to protect Israel's most vulnerable citizens. Most recently, a report by Im Tirtzu alleged that the United Nations' Goldstone report, which recommended independent Israeli and Palestinian inquiries into the conduct of last year's war in Gaza, would not have been possible without the support of the New Israel Fund (NIF), as well as other NGOs. Their report escalated to attempts in the Knesset to investigate the NIF and the funding of Israeli NGOs. Im Tirtzu also engaged in reprehensible personal attacks on the NIF's president, professor and former deputy Knesset speaker Naomi Chazan.

Naomi Chazan

The Israeli press and a broad coalition of groups and individuals both inside and outside of Israel quickly exposed the distortions of the Im Tirtzu report and condemned the attacks on Chazan. Members of the Knesset, including leaders of the Likud, blocked a proposed Knesset bill, decrying its fundamentally inappropriate and anti-democratic nature.

The democratic institutions that we as both Jews and Canadians hold dear are critical to Israel's survival and to its reputation as a beacon of democracy in the Middle East. This requires an active civil society in which citizens can participate in building a strong and just Israel.

Human rights organizations everywhere play a crucial role in ensuring that basic human rights are not at risk. Their messages may sometimes be difficult to hear, but it is the responsibility of every democratic society to investigate allegations when they stem from credible sources and to respond accordingly.

It may be tempting to argue that calling attention to instances in which Israel's actions may not be living up to its democratic ideals could serve to embolden Israel's enemies. However, there is an alternative view that must be considered: by strengthening Israel's democratic institutions, we preclude attempts to vilify Israel.

As one example, the human rights community successfully argued before Israel's Supreme Court that there were humanitarian consequences of the security barrier's route. After considering both humanitarian and security issues, the court ordered the route redrawn. As a result, criticism regarding the legitimacy of the barrier was rendered much less effective, because Israel could point to its internal democratic process that rightfully balanced the need for security with humanitarian concerns.

The right to express different points of view is an essential principle of any vibrant democracy. Those who care about Israel's survival have the freedom to support any of those voices. What we must not support are efforts to muzzle the free exchange of opinions. Respectful public discourse is an imperative for Israel's democracy to survive and mature.

Israel Dubinsky is president and Jay Brodbar is executive director of the New Israel Fund of Canada, an independent charity. Some of its projects partner with the New Israel Fund.

'WINSTON CHURCHILL: WALKING WITH DESTINY' WORLD PREMIERE

A veritable Who's Who of Toronto's Jewish community turned out for Opening Night on Monday, February 8 when Canada played host to the World Premiere of Academy Award winning Moriah Films' newest production, "Winston Churchill: Walking with Destiny". Close to 600 supporters of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC), the film's co-producer, packed the house at Varsity Cinemas in Toronto to be the first to view the eagerly anticipated documentary. Narrated by Sir Ben Kingsley, the film documents Churchill's rise to power and his courageous fight against the Nazis and the politics of appeasement.

Among the many prominent business leaders and philanthropists at the Premiere were Co-Chairs Ellis Jacob and Norm Bacal, and FSWC Board of Directors member Joel Feldberg, who thanked the Co-Chairs for their efforts. They were joined by Garry Foster, Chairman of the FSWC Board of Governors, and numerous well known supporters of the Center including the Shnaiders, Bronfmans, Feldbergs, Freedmans, Reitmans, Silbers, and Sonshines, as well as Michael Bregman and Katie Osborne, Joseph Gottdenker and family, Dorothy Shoichet and Hal Silverstein. Rabbi Marvin Hier, founder of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (SWC) in Los Angeles and Rabbi Meyer May, Executive Director of SWC flew in from California for the gala evening.

Said Avi Benlolo, President and CEO of FSWC, "I'm thrilled Canada was chosen to host the World Premiere of this film and proud to be involved as co-producer in such a great project. I am also extremely excited about our upcoming Spirit of Hope Benefit on May 31, when FSWC will host one of my personal heroes – Elie Wiesel, together with the brilliant and provocative Salman Rushdie. Brian Mulroney will moderate their discussion and I honestly cannot imagine a more magnificent opportunity to see two of the world's great humanitarians on stage together."

The evening event was capped off with a delicious treat courtesy of Saint Cinnamon, which generously donated their tasty trademark cinnamon buns as a late night snack for theater-goers as they made their way home.

"Winston Churchill: Walking with Destiny" is the 11th documentary produced by Moriah Films, a division of the SWC, which won an Academy Award for 'Genocide' in 1981 and another for 'The Long Way Home' in 1997. 'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Mordechai's lesson: just do it

By RABBI RAFI LIPNER

The tension is palpable. The entire Jewish nation is on the brink of extermination. A country is poised to destroy our people, and the only one who stands a chance of overturning the decree is none other than the wife of the king himself!

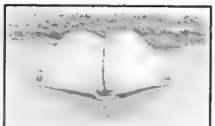
The suspense builds. What will the potential heroine do?

Her response comes. She's too scared to make a move. After all, the king decreed that no one may approach him unless they've been summoned. She fears he may take out his wrath on her, and this fear isn't unreasonable, for we know what happened to his previous wife.

When Mordechai hears this, he realizes he must convince Esther to change her mind, approach the king and hopefully save the day.

If you were Mordechai, what would you say? Maybe something like: "Esther, you're scared to say anything lest he kill you? But if you don't, we're all going to die!"

Perhaps some reverse psychology might work: "You're right. It's too risky. Who cares that everyone will get killed and our nation will be wiped out, as long as you're OK!"



Or why not get straight to the point: "Esther, you are our last hope. You have to do it for the sake of Jewish survival!"

But Mordechai forgoes any of these persuasive techniques. What comes out of his mouth is, at first glance, perplexing.

"Esther, don't worry – you don't have to put yourself forward. It's fine. Honestly. The Jews will somehow make it out of this predicament with or without your help."

At this point, if I was Esther I would breath a deep sigh of relief. The pressure's off. But what happens next? Against all logic, Esther responds by saying she's "going in."

What was it that Mordechai said that convinced Esther to change her mind?

Perhaps the answer is that Mordechai was teaching Esther – and all of us – an important life lesson. We're all put on this earth and in specific situations for a reason. While we often think the outcomes are dependent on us, in truth, we're the ones who are dependent on the actions we take in those very situations. Mordechai reminded Esther that while there was a promise that the Jewish people will always exist, there was no guarantee that she and her family would be remembered as having made any contribution. The Jews will never disappear from existence, but she might.

This doesn't only apply to big, historic moments. It also applies to our everyday lives. The approach we're supposed to take is not, "If I don't do something, it won't get done," but rather, "This might be what my calling is all about. I was put here with the opportunity to make the difference, and if I don't act, I forfeit fulfilling my potential in this world."

Often we think about doing something, but someone else ends up doing it first. We might have a great idea, only to pause, lose the desire and then be disappointed as someone else makes it a reality.

Don't mistake this as a desire for honour. Rather, it's about the need to express that you can and should make a difference. Mordechai reminded Esther that while we always have the option to bail out, if we do, we're the ones who lose.

So before reading the next article in this paper, pause and think of something that you could do – large or small. Think of all the excuses why you might not follow through, then realize that life is not about finding a way to get out of opportunities to make a difference. Rather, as Nike urges, "Just do it!"

Rabbi Rafi Lipner is director of The House, a Jewish educational centre for young adults, and a teacher at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Work in an era of candid cameras

Money Matters

The proliferation of technology has added new meaning to the talmudic teachings that "there is a seeing eye, a hearing ear and all our actions are written down in the book." No longer can one ever be guaranteed that the most trivial of our activities won't one day show up on YouTube or a Facebook page, or in the pages of a newspaper.

While our sages were referring to our need to constantly remind ourselves of God's presence, man's ability and seeming urge to record almost everything helps to make real for us the insight of our sages. Many have learned and continue to learn this message the hard way, leaving both their personal and professional lives in tatters.

As a tired employee of the Toronto Transit Commission recently discovered, even such an innocent act as dozing off can become front-page news. Unfortunately, the rush to broadcast news about others, regardless of the underlying situation, is the more serious infraction of behaviour, at least from an ethical perspective.

It's true that Jewish law mandates a very strict work ethic. In order to ensure that a person is maximally focused on his or her employment, Jewish law generally prohibits moonlighting and demands that employees get a proper night's sleep.

The obligation to put in an honest day's work was so central that employees were relieved of many (or at least had lowered) religious obligations, such as prayer and grace after meals. One cannot be religious on someone else's time and at someone else's expense.

The recent report of a Muslim bus driver in England who in the middle of his route stopped his bus and, blocking the exit doors, took a break for prayer would be a clear violation of Jewish law.

This story is reminiscent of a complaint that Rabbi Yisroel Salanter had against a passerby who, engrossed in thoughts of repentance on the eve of Yom Kippur, didn't greet the esteemed rabbi. While such thoughts are very important, they don't excuse us from carrying out our basic human obligations.

Clearly, sleeping on the job is not to be encouraged. Yet that doesn't mean everyone has to know about it. Reporting information that portrays someone in a negative light, even if 100 per cent accurate, violates the Jewish laws of gossip. At times, revealing such information is mandated in order to prevent harm or correct a wrong. Never is revealing such information optional. Either it's forbidden due to the laws of gossip, or it's mandatory, since a compelling need overrides the concern with gossip.

Yet revealing such information must follow strict guidelines, which would include speaking to the "perpetrator" first, allowing him or her to take corrective action, revealing the information only to those who need to know, and not deriving any personal pleasure from performing this necessary obligation. The notion of getting back at someone is foreign to our system of ethics and must be resisted, even if it means important information will not be revealed.

Discovering a relatively minor infraction – catching someone napping on the job without understanding the context – does not grant one permission to broadcast that information to all.

An employee would have to be regularly asleep on the job to have grounds for their dismissal. And this can be done only after a proper warning is given. Since Jewish ethics believes in preventing – and then if necessary correcting – wrongs, placing hidden cameras in sensitive spots to try to catch someone would be an invasion of privacy and a violation of our ethical norms.

However, it's well within the right of an employer to notify an employee of having cameras overseeing his work, so that the employee will be forewarned to ensure they fulfil the job to the best of their ability.

Jewish Life

Book offers seeds of spiritual wisdom

By ELAN DIVON
Special to The CJN

Rabbi Yoel Glick's Seeking the Divine Presence: The Three Pillars of a Jewish Spiritual Life is an ambitious and rather unconventional book that provides insight into the foundations of a spiritual practice.

Why unconventional? Because although written by a Jewish rabbi, a person we tend to associate with tradition and Orthodoxy, the book surprises in its inclusion of other religious traditions such as Hinduism, Buddhism and Christianity, and moreover, challenges us to rethink the very purpose of religion in our day-to-day lives.

Written in a somewhat dry but straightforward manner, the book is a worthy read for anyone seeking spiritual insight, wisdom and a deeper understanding of religion's highest function.

Guest Voice

Elan Divon

Not surprisingly, Rabbi Glick's worldview is a mystical, kabbalistic one. He sees religion as a vehicle for moving the individual closer to God consciousness and to an experience of unity with the Divine. God knowledge is something that comes from experience, Rabbi Glick writes, not from intellectual pursuits. In other words, studying the Torah or other religious texts will only take us so far – we are going to have to live in the world and transform ourselves through the inner reaches of outer experience.

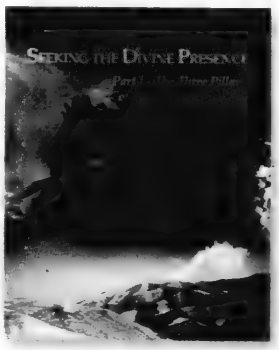
At the heart of Rabbi Glick's theology lies the notion that religion is about expanding our consciousness to the point where our perspective becomes totally inclusive and undifferentiated. Where we embrace the good, the bad and the ugly, and realize that everything in this world, even our enemies and nightmarish struggles, comes from the same Divine source that created us.

Spiritual growth, he explains, is equivalent to an expansion of consciousness, developing an inclusiveness in our perspective that enables us to see and feel with the whole arc of human experience – and this leads us to the recognition of the underlying unity of all religions and peoples. After all, is this not what religion literally means? To rejoin (from the Latin ligare)... ourselves with God.

Fair enough. But how do we arrive at this wonderful undifferentiated place within? This question consumes the majority of the book, as we are guided, somewhat unpredictably, by a variety of theoretical and esoteric teachings from across the religious spectrum. Drawing upon a barrage of anecdotes from the Baal Shem Tov to Saint Francis of Assisi and the Indian seer and sage Ramakrishna, Rabbi Glick weaves his way between East and West as he describes the virtue of humility, surrender and sacrifice, and how these must be cultivated together with discipline, courage and mindfulness in the evolution of our consciousness.

And for those of us left wondering what is distinctly Jewish about this transformative process, Rabbi Glick dedicates the final chapters of his volume to a mystical interpretation of the Jewish holidays, describing how each holiday (or holy day) functions as an instrument for spiritual growth.

One dimension of the manuscript that I particularly appreciated is its brutal honesty. Unlike most quick-fix, feel-good spiritual guides available today, Seeking the Divine Presence provides a sobering account of the pains and difficulties required of the spiritual practitioner. Indeed, the spiritual journey is not about finding peace and contentment, Rabbi Glick explains. It's about self-transformation. And this transformation can only arrive through great pain and tumult.



Like the patriarchs of Israel who are tried and tested, even humiliated, before achieving their exalted status, or the people of Israel who must first taste the bitterness of exile before inheriting the land of promise, each of us has to contend with our own demons and personal exiles. A wonderful Hindu metaphor is used to drive home this point: The dhobi (washerman) when washing clothes, beats them against a rock. But he does so only to remove the dirt from the clothes. Similarly, all sufferings are given for the sole purpose of purifying the mind of the devotee.

Now, this is where things get a little tricky. After reading the book from cover to cover, I realized that two competing arguments are at play. On the one hand, we are told that struggle is the hallmark of the spiritual devotee. You have to discipline your mind, struggle with your desires, tame your ego. This is a world of battle, Rabbi Glick reminds us. We come to this world to evolve and grow. If we do not constantly struggle, then we will have wasted the great opportunity that life in this world presents. This makes perfect sense. After all, struggle is what the patriarch Jacob encountered to warrant his transformation into Israel; it's what Adam and humankind were made to experience in their banishment from Eden, and it's what the Jewish people encounter time and time again.

Okay. But in the same breath, we are also charged to surrender our ego and our will to the Almighty. Contentment arrives from submitting to God's will and accepting with joy what He has given us, Rabbi Glick says. In fact, throughout much of his book, he talks about aligning our will with the will of God and following God's directives, even when these are painful and destructive. Abraham's submission to God in the famous story of the Akedah, the binding of Isaac, can be taken as a case in point.

So, on the one hand, spirituality is a constant striving against our nature in an effort to cultivate and control it, but on the other hand, it's about our total surrender to God and His will. Do I sense a contradiction? But that's just the point! Although largely implicit in Rabbi Glick's writing, this paradox, I believe, speaks to the heart of spirituality in its unpredictable fluctuation between struggle and surrender and our requirement to choose between each in every moment. For within this tension lies a powerful message regarding the attitude we must cultivate, one that is quietly unattached to the whims of reality as we strive to do the best we can in this world, while accepting that the outcome, the fruits of our actions, are always beyond our control. The important Hindu scripture the Bhagavad-Gita, the binding of Isaac and the Buddha would certainly agree. Contradiction resolved.

There's no question that Rabbi Glick "gets it," as Seeking the Divine Presence offers many valuable seeds of wisdom. And although the style may limit the book's audience to the most disciplined of spiritual seekers, the substance is solid, enlightening and enriching, and promises to make you think.

Israel to open trade office in Calgary

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

The Israeli government's economic mission to Canada is opening up an office in Calgary to service Western Canada.

Israeli Consul General Amir Gissin told The CJN that there is huge potential to increase trade between Israel and Western Canada with an office in Calgary.

"We want to give Israeli companies the chance to find Canadian partners and vice versa," Gissin said.

The Israel Economic Mission in Canada aims to promote trade, investment opportunities and joint ventures between Canada and Israel. The mission's Canadian head office is in Toronto, and there is also a branch in Montreal. The Calgary office will be the first in Western Canada.

Jonathan Levy, Israel's trade commissioner, said that bilateral trade between Canada and Israel has been on the rise, now amounting to "about $1.5 billion, with a surplus to Israel, meaning that Israel exports more to Canada than she imports.

"We realize that without an on-the-ground presence in Western Canada, it is difficult to achieve business results that we want to achieve. We are missing a lot of opportunities that we can capitalize on," he said

One of the reasons that Calgary was chosen for what Levy described as this "pilot project" is that the Calgary Economic Development Centre and the three-time mayor of Calgary, David Bronconnier, have been actively promoting the city as a place for conducting international business.

"They are creating an international centre and providing office services in a very accommodating way, that will give us good access to the economic organizations of the city. Israel is one of the first countries that are going to try this model, and the city of Calgary is very eager to have us come aboard," said Levy.

He added that Israel will be looking to form partnerships with Canadian companies in the fields of "IT, medical devices, and clean-tech [environmental technology] in areas such as water and renewable energy."

Levy said "more than 95 per cent of all laptop computers have been designed in Israel" and that the "BlackBerry has an Israeli heart."

Gissin told The CJN that "it is only natural for Canada to look to Israel in the high-tech field"

He added, "In a sophisticated world, every country is looking for strategic partnerships… The Israeli and Canadian economies have one thing in common – both focus on American markets. The difficulties in the U.S. market have caused Israel and Canada to look less towards the U.S and more towards each other."

Levy said that the person hired to staff the Calgary office, "will not be a [government] diplomat," but rather a local, non-Israeli professional person who is familiar with the Western Canadian business scene.

He added that if the pilot project works in Calgary, it is possible it will be replicated in other cities in Canada. He also noted that the choice of Calgary was made for business reasons only, and was not a "political" decision.

Although the Jewish community in Calgary is relatively small, Gissin said that was not a factor in the decision to open an office in Calgary. "We're coming to Calgary to do business," he said.

Vancouver campaign raises over $7M

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — While the recession cloaked the country, the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver managed to raise $7.325 million in its 2009 annual campaign, an increase of $125,000 over the previous year.

The campaign's slogan, "Put Yourself in Our Feet," really resonated with donors, says Michael Fugman, who chairs the JFGV board.

"People just don't realize how much we have to do for so many people," he said. "In the past when I was out campaigning, it was like trying to get blood from a stone, but this past year my experience was that people were proud to give. I think they really do care and are becoming more aware of the needs out there."

The Jewish Agency for Israel is the primary recipient of the federation's overseas funding, while locally the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver and Jewish Family Services are the two largest recipients. Some 300 canvassers volunteered their time to fundraise for the campaign, which ran September through November. Last year, federation worked to reduce its operating costs to maximize funding available to agencies, in part by eliminating 4-1/2 full-time jobs.

"We're very pleased we were able to come back with an increased campaign after 2008, in a challenging environment," said Mark Gurvis, executive director of JFGV. "We feel very good about what the community was able to accomplish this year, and we're looking to build on that for future growth so we can meet a broader set of needs here, in Israel and around the world."

Fugman agrees, adding that the results make him proud to live here. "We have a great, great community, and it's really evident that people care," he said.

Jewish, Muslim students share a laugh together

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In a rare collaboration on Canadian university campuses, the Jewish and Muslim student associations here are co-hosting an evening of comedy on March 4, featuring the Israel-Palestinian Comedy Tour.

The Israel-based comedy troupe, which was formed in November 2006 and made its Canadian debut at the Roy Thomson Hall in Toronto in May 2007, features four standup comics. Charley Warady headlined comedy clubs and colleges across the United States, appearing on both NBC and Comedy Central, before emigrating to Israel more than 10 years ago. Ray Hanania is a Palestinian-American standup comedian and an award-winning columnist for publications including Yediot Achronot's English website Ynetnews.com, the Arab News in Saudi Arabia and the Jerusalem Post. Aaron Freeman, a black American convert to Judaism, is a standup comedian, columnist and radio commentator. Yisrael Campbell is an Orthodox Jew who was born Catholic. He made aliyah eight years ago and has performed standup comedy around the world.

The Winnipeg program came together as a result of a meeting between Jewish Student Association (JSA) president Eyal Kraut and Muslim Student Association (MSA) president Asma Mneina. They met at an interfaith program in November where they both spoke to an audience of high school students about their communities.

"On so many Canadian campuses, there is tension between Jewish and Muslim students," says Kraut, a third-year arts student at the University of Manitoba. "Asma and I thought that by having joint programs, we could alleviate that tension here. After all, we are all students at the university. Despite differences of opinion on certain issues, we all have similar concerns as students."

"I thought it was a good idea to do something together," says Mneina, a first-year arts student, also at U of M, who came to Winnipeg from Libya with her family when she was a baby. "I was active in high school, and when I started university, I saw a void in interfaith and intercommunal activities. There are a lot of different communities reflected at the university level. It's refreshing to have Jewish and Muslim student groups working together."

Kraut reports that the two groups have already held one joint event aimed at promoting the comedy evening. On Feb. 12, they staged a hummus competition. One Jewish student and one Muslim student each prepared a quantity of hummus, and students were invited to sample them and vote on which was the tastiest.

The hummus prepared by the Muslim student was preferred by the majority of students who took the taste test, Kraut says.

Mneina and Kraut are looking forward to more joint programming in future.

You can reach Eyal Kraut at eyalki@hotmail.com or 479-6190.

Jewish groups appeal for calm over chassidic schools

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC) is warning the government opposition, unions and media not to make a small number of chassidic schools the lightning rod for what is promising to be an anguished debate over the province's "identity" and how that can be reconciled with accommodation of religious minorities.

"We do not want the Quebec identity debated on the backs of a handful of schools in Outremont," said QJC president Adam Atlas. "It's a mistake to make Jews the centrepiece of this debate."

He said Education Minister Michelle Courchesne's proposed reform of the school year calendar is "an important step forward" because it may make it possible for these six schools to, at last, fully teach the mandatory curriculum, while maintaining their traditional religious instruction.

At the same time, the change can benefit the entire school system, perhaps even reduce the province's high dropout rate, he said.

Atlas suggested that those worried that this modification of the law threatens the goal of state neutrality might better consider removing the crucifix from the National Assembly, the cross from Mount Royal or eliminating statutory Christian holidays. However, he added, QJC is not advocating any of these moves.

Fears that accommodation of the chassidic schools by the government will somehow open the door to the creation of more religious schools are unfounded, in Atlas's opinion. "I don't think this is going to change anything...and may go some way to help [chassidim] integrate into Quebec society."

QJC has not been directly involved in the talks between the chassidic schools and the ministry, which have been going on for a couple of years.

Courchesne's decree, deposited Feb. 3, would base the minimum length of the school year on the total number of hours, rather than days, which means schools could fulfil that time on weekends and in summer.

The chassidim could extend their teaching time into Sunday. The change would also allow flexibility with regard to holidays taken.

Forty-five days of consultation are required before the decree becomes law.

Although the modification affects all schools, public or private, critics maintain Courchesne's main motivation was resolving the chassidic schools issue, in effect, catering to a tiny group that has defied the law for many years – and, in most cases, continued to receive public funding.

She has been derided in a couple of French papers as "Rabbi Courchesne" and caricatured as a chassid.

Two of the schools, however, have reportedly informed the minister that they will not be complying, even after the calendar change: the Rabbinical College of the Tash community in Boisbriand and the Satmar community's Yeshiva Toras Moshe in Mile End.

B'nai Brith Canada also decried turning the school calendar modification into a Jewish issue and placing these six schools at the eye of a storm. Moïse Moghrabi, Quebec chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, said, "it is wrong to claim that these changes open the door to a return to confessional schools. Religious education is a right that private schools, Jewish or not, have and currently exercise."

Quebec's public schools, historically either Catholic or Protestant, have been non-denominational since 1998.

"The proposed modification to the school calendar is simply a question of giving a larger margin of flexibility to schools to realize specific projects such as sports, arts, internships and vocational training. Accordingly, this is not at all an issue of 'unreasonable' accommodation," he stated.

Courchesne said little about the negotiations with the schools until last April when she issued an ultimatum that they must comply with the law by this past September, or face legal action. The communities themselves have said even less.

Max Lieberman, a spokesperson for the Jewish Orthodox Community Council, declined to answer any questions from The CJN. "We are not interested in engaging in any discussion, it would not do us any good."

Even the schools involved have not been made public by the ministry, but the Belz, Skver, Satmar and Tash communities have been identified in the media.

The Parti Québécois (PQ) has called for the repeal of Courchesne's decree and charged that she erred in making a secret deal with these schools and undertaking such a transformation of the school system without public consultation. The PQ says it will pave the way for the "reconfessionalization" of the province's schools.

The major unions, the Centrale des syndicats du Québec and the Fédération des syndicats de l'enseignement, the big teachers' union, have also demanded that the plan be dropped.

The issue of "illegal" Jewish schools has been the focus of intense French-language media scrutiny for more than three years, even though these six schools and others associated with the chassidic communities have been around for a long time, some more than five decades. Most receive government funding, although not all. It also is not clear if all even have permits.

Until the media scrutiny, successive governments have generally turned a blind eye to the situation.

The problem appears to be confined to the boys' schools, especially at the high school level, which are said to not be sufficiently teaching the required secular subjects. For the most part, these students do not write the provincial exams or receive high school leaving certificates.

Since 2006, Federation CJA has taken the position that the schools must conform to the law. The schools in questions are not affiliated with the federation agency, the Association of Jewish Day Schools.

Courchesne received some unexpected support last week from former PQ premier Lucien Bouchard who said he did not like the tone the party is taking.

ACT OF GOD

A film by Jennifer Baichwal

Award-winning Canadian director Jennifer Baichwal's Act of God is a documentary about the metaphysical effects of being struck by lightning. The film explores seven stories that raise questions about chance, fate, and the meaning of life.

Featuring Paul Auster, the best-selling novelist, struck as a teenager, and musician, Fred Frith, whose original compositions demonstrate the ubiquity of electricity in our bodies and in the universe.

Wednesday, March 3, 7:30 pm
Congregation Habonim, 5 Glen Park Avenue
(one block north of Bathurst & Glencairn)

Discussion with Director Jennifer Baichwal to follow screening.

Admission: Charitable Donation at Door.

Obituary

Koschitzky matriarch was a role model

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The matriarch of a family known for its support of Jewish education and other causes in the Jewish community – among them the Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, the Golda Koschitzky chair in Jewish Education at Yeshiva University's Azrieli Graduate School of Jewish Education, and the Golda Koschitzky Women's Halachic Hotline – died Feb. 13 in Toronto.

Golda Koschitzky at age 100 in Jerusalem, on Sukkot 2007

Golda Koschitzky was 102, and had celebrated her last three birthdays in Israel.

In a eulogy at her funeral in Toronto, Rabbi Yehoshua Weber of Clanton Park Synagogue spoke of her wisdom, fortitude and "stoic sense of self-confidence" and her sincere, committed religious observance.

Rabbi Shlomo Gemara, rosh yeshiva of Bnei Akiva Schools, who also spoke at the funeral, recalled her inner strength and sharp mind. As well, "her heart was exactly in the right place," he told The CJN.

"She led a rich and full, incredible life. She was a truly great matriarch... a role model," her daughter-in-law Julia Koschitzky said last Thursday after returning from Israel, where her mother-in-law's burial took place.

Golda Landau was born in Lutowiska, Poland, the descendent of two rabbinic dynasties. As a young child during World War I, she fled from Poland to Hungary with her parents and younger brothers by horse and buggy. She spent three years in Prague, studying at a German-language school, before the family returned home in 1917. Because her school had only five grades, Golda took private lessons to attain the equivalent of a high school education, Julia said. She belonged to the local Zionist youth organization, and as a young woman helped her father run his dry goods business.

In 1933, the year that Hitler came to power, Golda married Israel Koschitzky, a native of Oswiecim (Auschwitz) who was in the roofing business, and who shared Golda's interest in literature and worldly issues.

Difficulties and challenges lay ahead: The couple was exiled to Siberia during World War II, and Golda insisted on taking their two young sons. Her decision saved their lives, Julia noted.

After the war, the family immigrated from Germany to Canada. In Winnipeg, where they had cousins, Golda washed dishes in a restaurant, while Israel took a job loading sugar boxes onto a truck and worked as a ba'al tfillah (prayer leader), as they built a new life.

Golda never bemoaned her fate, said Julia. "Whatever life had in store, she faced it bravely."

Israel, who died 15 years ago, established a roofing business in Calgary in 1957, and later in Toronto. In his 60s, Israel decided to take on a new challenge: starting a roofing business in Belgium. He and Golda spent the next 23 years in Antwerp.

"They were great Zionists," Julia said of her in-laws. "They were believers in education. They built a mikvah here [in Toronto,] and Jewish institutions here and in Israel. They always found a Hebrew teacher for their sons. I think [what drove them] was a sense of responsibility, and that they felt they had to share their good fortune."

Koschitzky is survived by her sons Saul and Henry, daughters-in-law Mira and Julia, seven grandchildren, and many great-grandchildren.

High school's oldest 'grad' gets honorary diploma

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

When Toronto Holocaust survivor, Martin Maxwell was 14 years old, he was only weeks away from his high school graduation.

Maxwell, now 86, and his brother, Leo, were rounded up by the Nazi SS officers, but they were miraculously freed because of a "letter of passage" obtained from a German soldier who had employed Leo at one time. Their two sisters died in a concentration camp.

Shortly after that, Maxwell, an orphan, fled from the Nazis in Austria following Kristallnacht in November 1938. He came to England where he was adopted by a British family.

In 1942, he joined the British army. He took part in the D-Day invasion of Normandy in June 1944, and later the same year, he fought at the battle of Arnhem in Holland, where he was wounded and held as a prisoner for seven months.

The decorated veteran came to Canada in 1952 and made his home in Toronto where he has a successful health and beauty business.

Maxwell, a volunteer speaker for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, has reached out to thousands of students and groups, sharing his story of survival and overcoming obstacles, encouraging tolerance and respect.

For many years, Maxwell didn't talk about his painful past. But when a friend asked him to fill in for a Holocaust speaker who was unable to come, Maxwell says he was finally able to talk about his past without reliving it.

During Holocaust Education Week last November, Maxwell was the guest speaker for students and staff at The York School on Yonge Street south of St. Clair Avenue, where his topic was "My Personal Testimony: From Kristallnacht to Liberation."

The staff and students were so moved by Maxwell's presentation that when they learned he had never had the opportunity to graduate from high school, the school decided to present him with an honorary secondary school graduation certificate.

Holocaust survivor Martin Maxwell, right, accepts an honorary high school graduation certificate from The York School's upper school principal, David Hamilton.

At a recent school assembly his wife, Eleanor, son Randy and granddaughter Carly were there to see him receive his certificate.

He told the students it's important to try your best and treat people with dignity. "It's not the falling down that counts, but the getting up," he said. "I receive this honorary degree, not only for myself but for my two little sisters and the million and half children who died in the Holocaust, and the other children who never had a chance to live long enough to go to school and graduate."

The graduation diploma "recognized Martin Maxwell for his courage and perseverance. He is a lifelong learner who exemplifies the ideal of The York School and the International Baccalaureate Programme.

"He contributes to his community by helping people to understand diversity and conflict by encouraging them to pursue world peace."

At the graduation ceremony, David Hamilton, York's upper school principal, said, "There are so many life lessons that Mr. Maxwell taught us that morning that we truly felt we owed him so much."

Purim party promotes Jewish pride

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

There will be dancing, there will be singing and there will be Jewish pride. This is the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University's response to the upcoming Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW).

CFHU is launching its Be U Be Hebrew campaign during its Purim party on Feb. 28, which will feature the Israeli hip hop band Hadag Nahash. The campaign's goal is to motivate students to maintain their Jewish pride while they prepare for IAW, which will run from March 1 to 14.

IAW, which will include speakers and rallies on university campuses, compares Israel's situation to apartheid in South Africa.

Canadian Friends of Hebrew U program designed to counter Israel Apartheid Week

"Apartheid week is... in my opinion a one-sided, anti-Semitic campaign," said Rami Kleinmann, the national director of CFHU.

"It's intimidating Jewish people. It's actually forcing a lot of students to hide their Jewish identity this week, which is something that... the Jewish community cannot stand."

CFHU will continue to support pro-Israel activities on campus after the party through their campaign.

"[It's] a very simple message of [being] proud of who you are. You did nothing wrong; don't let anyone else make you feel ashamed of who you are," Kleinmann said.

The CFHU decided to launch its campaign through this party because of the comparisons that can be made between the current situation and Purim, which celebrates a foiled plot to eradicate the Jewish people in the ancient Persian empire.

"If you look at both situations, there is a very strong link between what happened 2,000 years ago and what people in Apartheid Week are trying to do," Kleinmann said. "What we're trying to do is give [students] a historical perspective by saying... this is not something new."

The CFHU's campaign aims at providing the right tools to the younger generation to combat anti-Israel initiatives like IAW, Kleinmann said.

"[The younger] generation is becoming a player in this unfortunate game. By giving them a little bit of pride, it will be a good place to start," he said. "Fortunately we're living in a democratic country where we can use the democratic tools to combat anti-Semitism."

Funds from the Purim party will go to the Vidal Sassoon International Center for the Study of Anti-Semitism at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, which focuses on relations between Jews and non-Jews in situations of crisis.

For Miriam Pilc-Levine, the national director of communications and marketing at CFHU, the party is a good way to launch the campaign.

"It got started because we wanted to play a role in showing the students that they have support from the Jewish community," she said.

"The whole piece kind of fits together with Purim and wanting to have a celebration. I guess the students find themselves overwhelmed by the supporters of Israel Apartheid Week. We wanted to give them an opportunity to be proud of who they are."

Releasing Schalit called a 'complex issue'

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

The kidnapping of Gilad Schalit is not a black and white issue, said Middle East analyst and educator Ari Applbaum.

Applbaum spoke earlier this month to a group of young people at the House, a Jewish social and educational centre. He created the lecture about Schalit as part of the educational programming of the David Project, a non-profit organization that encourages Jewish leadership through educational seminars and workshops, on college campuses and off.

Ari Applbaum

In leading the event, which was organized by the House and the Birthright Israel Alumni Community, Applbaum concentrated on humanizing the sometimes controversial issue of kidnapped Israeli soldiers.

"I started with saying [Schalit] is a person," he told The CJN after the talk. "I wanted to remind them that he's a person. I told a little bit about his life."

Schalit, a staff sergeant in the Israel Defence Forces, was kidnapped by Palestinian militants near the Gaza Strip on June 25, 2006. He is currently believed to be alive and is being held by Hamas.

Two other soldiers, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, were also kidnapped around the same time. Goldwasser and Regev were held by Hezbollah and killed.

These three abductions led to military actions in Gaza and to the Second Lebanon War in 2006.

"I think that it's such an emotional issue. Israelis have such a complicated relationship with it. It's hard for [people] outside the country to understand," he said. "I tried to bring shades of gray [to the discussion]."

During the lecture, he also discussed the return of Goldwasser's and Regev's bodies, which were swapped for five Hezbollah prisoners in July 2008.

"It was really controversial. Until the last moment, [the army] wasn't sure whether they were alive or dead. Until the last day, Hezbollah dropped hints that they were alive," he said. "Many Israelis said if you're willing to put a price on two question marks, what you're conveying is it doesn't really matter... why keep them alive?"

Applbaum's lecture ended with a discussion about the best course of action to achieve Schalit's release.

He said there are three options when dealing with Schalit: to let the issue go, to stage another military action or to negotiate a swap.

"[The first] is a non-starter in Israel. It's not even weighed as a serious option," he said, adding that there will most likely be a swap, possibly for some 1,000 Palestinian prisoners.

"People say that the IDF is a unique army... one tool in their toolbox is knowing that whatever happens, they'll return home," Applbaum said. "Proponents of the deal say that if you lose that commitment, soldiers will not go into battle prepared."

While the lecture was meant to inform, Applbaum's main goal was to initiate a discussion with the audience.

"The facts can be researched by anyone in the audience. The answers are out there. The value I brought was in facilitating a discussion where the audience began to understand the complexity [of the situation]," he said after the lecture.

Brandon Marlon, 30, who was in the audience, agreed. "It's always best when it's interactive," he said. "It's always good to talk about it. I think it's a complex issue. The idea is to rise above the emotions."

For Lior Cyngiser, the alumni relationship co-ordinator for the Birthright Israel Alumni Community, the talk was an important one, especially for the event's target audience – Jews aged 20 to 30.

"I think it's super relevant because the target audience are all connected to Israel... Everyone can relate to the issue. It's important to keep the issue alive," he said.

Remembrance of food past

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

We associate people with all kinds of things – a song, a place or an article of clothing can conjure up an image or a memory of a familiar person.

The same holds true for food. For instance, hamantashen, those triangular filled cookies we eat on Purim, remind me of my paternal grandmother, Ethel Kirshner. She would spend hours making these tiny, delicate, prune-filled hamantashen.

She tried to teach me to make them, but at the time, I wasn't interested in mastering a culinary activity that was so labour-intensive. I was too young to appreciate the value of preserving family recipes, but they are, indeed, precious heirlooms. When my grandmother died, her hamantash recipe was lost forever.

Another family recipe that has gone by the wayside is that of Toby Dollin's mun (poppy seed) cookies. She was the mother of my childhood friend Connie (Dollin) Smilowitz.

Mrs. Dollin was a real balabuste. Her house was always spotless, and she was a terrific baker. Her mun cookies were a fixture on her kitchen counter. She was not in the habit of letting people help themselves to the cookies, but I was an exception, and I could easily polish off a dozen in a single sitting. Her daughter laments that she never learned to bake those delicious, wafer-thin cookies.

When I eat mandelbroit, I think of the late Pearl Schwartzman. She was a warm and exceptionally kind woman who made delicious mandelbroit.

During her shivah last year, her daughters, Sandra and Cindy, shared childhood memories of their mother. They reminisced about coming home from school and finding a plate of homemade mandelbroit waiting for them on the kitchen table. It was part of a daily afternoon ritual: Mrs. Schwartzman sat and listened to her daughters talk about their day over mandelbroit and milk.

The scene, which has stuck with me, epitomizes the selflessness of mothers of Mrs. Schwartzman's generation. Most of these women did not work outside of the home. Their lives revolved around their families.

Mrs. Schwartzman's mandelbroit recipe may have disappeared, but for her children, the memory of her mandelbroit is indelible.

The following recipes come from Second Helpings Please, edited by food writer and author Norene Gilletz (1974).

HAMANTASHEN

Cream Cheese Dough
1/2 lb. butter
1/2 lb. cream cheese
2 cups flour
1/4 cup icing sugar

Cream butter and cheese well. Add flour and sugar and mix well. Wrap in wax paper and refrigerate overnight. Roll dough to 1/4-inch thickness. Cut in rounds. Fill and shape by bringing the sides together to form a triangle. Bake on a greased baking sheet for 15 minutes at 400 until delicately browned. Yield: 2 dozen.

Prune Filling
1 lb. prunes, stewed, pitted and chopped
1 cup raisins, chopped
1/4 cup chopped nuts
1/2 lemon, juice and rind
1/4 cup bread crumbs
1/2 cup sugar
1 tbsp. honey

Combine all ingredients and mix thoroughly

SRUGIM

3 EPISODES Another example of the high quality television produced in Israel, Srugim has become a huge hit among secular and religious Jews alike who find this vibrant piece of Israeli pop-culture identifiable and terribly addictive. Set in modern-day Jerusalem, Srugim presents a smart and funny portrait of the world of religious Jewish thirty-something singles. The intelligent men and women of this series seek to reconcile their religious observance, the expectations from their elders to marry early, and their need for warmth and companionship. But beyond its Jewish milieu, Srugim speaks compellingly to all those who struggle to find love and themselves. Israel 2008, 3 x 30 min, Hebrew with English subtitles.

JWI completes transformation

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Over the past five years, Jewish Women International of Canada has reinvented itself.

The final step of that transformation took place last November, when its governance was taken over by a board of directors, said Penny Krowitz, JWI/C executive director.

The process began a number of years ago, said Krowitz, when JWI/C recognized that the landscape had changed for membership organizations.

"Young women were leading different lives than their mothers and grandmothers had. The young women were not as committed to organizational life. This was not just a Jewish phenomenon or a women's phenomenon. It was North American-wide."

She said that young women, especially, had many valid reasons for not participating. "At one time, women joined organizations because they needed outside stimulation. Now, young women are working and don't have the time."

With that in mind, said Krowitz, the organization began a strategic planning process designed to envision the future of JWI. "It was a difficult process and very emotional. We had to be brutally honest about our strengths and weaknesses, discard what didn't work and adopt new ways.

"We changed the organization from an internally focused membership organization to an externally focused social-change organization, with membership."

She said members recognized that a lot of work was needed in the area of violence against women and, for the past five years, have focused all their resolutions on this issue.

The concept behind having a board of directors, she said, is that the board is made up of women from across Canada, who may or may not be involved in the organization – previously the national executive was made up of members – and who all have an interest in ending violence against women.

"They bring to the table their interest in the issue, their professional experience, and their contacts and connections."

Krowitz said that JWI members were kept informed throughout the entire process, and they were invited to participate. "We also needed, however, broad community involvement, and we wanted a geographic representation."

Currently, she said, there are four board members – Jill Leiberman from Montreal; Laura Martin from Calgary, and Sandra Posluns and Carole Tanenbaum from Toronto – and the group is looking to expand to 10 members.

JWI also has a national leadership council made up of members and supporters across Canada, she said. "The board of directors determines and sets policies, fundraises and manages the affairs of the organization. The leadership council implements the programming."

MC prepared cities across Canada for torch relay

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Bram Goldstein's cross-Canada road trip included -37 C temperatures, crowds of 15,000 cheering fans and a 300-metre jog with an Olympic torch.

Goldstein, head of BiG Entertainment in Toronto, was approached by RBC, an official sponsor of the Vancouver 2010 Winter Olympics, and asked to create a 10- to 15-minute show to get cities ready for the Olympic Torch Relay.

"It's a big deal," Goldstein, 35, said of the offer. "RBC... trusted me to represent them on the world stage."

Goldstein created a mobile art show, which included one of two artists splattering paint onto a spinning canvas as Goldstein MCs. The globs of paint eventually formed an image of a torch bearer, which was donated to each city involved in the relay.

"This is the biggest thing I've ever been a part of," said Goldstein.

For the MC, the show epitomized his love of the entertainment industry.

"It's that bar mitzvah feeling. You get onstage, you're talking to the people, you're getting them jumping, singing, dancing... We really have a lot of fun up there."

Goldstein started off his career in the entertainment industry as a DJ when he was about 15. It didn't take long to get hooked.

"I wear many different hats. I loved performing, I loved music, I loved being my own boss. I loved events," he said, adding that he started his own party-planning company, BiG Entertainment, nine years ago. "I enjoyed standing back and watching people have a good time. The best feeling in the world is when you come up with a concept and see people have a good time."

At the pre-relay Olympic shows, Goldstein was able to do just that. He MC'd for about 80 of the 106 days, and toured through hundreds of cities, including Yellowknife, Timmins, Ont., and Victoria.

"We got to see every community, every gas station, every restaurant," he said, adding that he toured with some 250 others from RBC and Coca-Cola Canada.

"It was amazing... When you go into the town and you see the Canadian flags waving, it puts a smile on your face."

For Goldstein, the tour allowed him to connect to his country.

"[When you] live in Toronto, you think you live in a bubble. [On the tour] I saw places I'll never be able to see again. You're in a car, you're seeing the landscapes, you're seeing how other people live and you're realizing you're very lucky."

One of Goldstein's most memorable moments came on the first night of the relay, in Victoria.

"You're standing in front of a crowd of 15,000 people, seeing them all so excited. That first night, when we did the first show, I knew it would be a success," he said.

Goldstein also remembers a cold day in Timmins, Ont., where the temperature was -37 C. The performers were freezing, the stage was filled with blankets and heaters, and the show went on.

Bram Goldstein, 35, created and MC'd a show to get communities ready for the Olympic Torch Relay. He also helped carry the torch through Merritt, B.C.

"It was definitely an unforgettable night," he said.

While on the cross-country tour, Goldstein got to see hundreds of torch bearers, including hockey superstar Sidney Crosby and singer Shania Twain, who ran in Timmins.

"She asked to see if she can have one of our paintings. She loved it," he said.

When watching the Olympics on TV, Goldstein always enjoyed the montages of the best and worst moments.

"I was more into that, seeing the music come together with somebody crying or falling or winning gold," he said.

Goldstein's role in the tour was to get the crowds excited for the torch. But he ended up becoming a part of the relay's bigger goal – to bring Canadian communities together.

"We've seen families come together. Every time you hear Oh Canada, that's the moment that we stand there in silence and we're so proud," he said.

"I never in my life have been more proud to be Canadian. People ask us all the time what energizes us each day. It's going into the towns. You see the kids, you see people smiling, dancing, singing. It makes you feel alive."

As a reward for creating and running his show, Goldstein got to represent RBC as a torch bearer in Merritt, B.C.

"It was a huge honour for me. That was a big moment... I've had some incredible experiences in my life, but this tops it all," he said. "When you look up and someone passes that torch to you, it all comes together."

Goldstein ran about 300 metres while carrying the torch. It was 300 metres he'll never forget.

"What I remember is that the flame came really quickly. I remember you just take in the moment. It's hard to describe in words," he said, adding that while he held the torch, he thought of his wife and daughter.

"I can't wait to get home to show Samantha that her daddy was a torch bearer. I made a difference. That's why I'm here. That's why I got a chance to run. We gave them a show."

Lieberman on Dubai hit: Arabs always blame Israel

By AVI ISSACHAROFF and BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

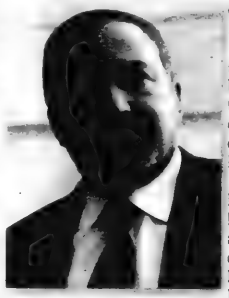
BRUSSELS — During a meeting between Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman and Irish Foreign Minister Michael Martin on Monday, Lieberman was asked about the alleged use of fraudulent Irish passports by the suspected assassins of Hamas terrorist Mahmoud al-Mabhouh.

Mabhouh, a Hamas commander, was assassinated in a hotel in Dubai last month.

"The Arabs have a tendency to blame Israel for anything that happens in the Middle East," Lieberman said, adding that the region "has many internal struggles within groups and states which are not as democratic as Israel is."



Avigdor Lieberman

Martin also reportedly questioned Lieberman about the fact that the Dubai police chief had stated he was "99 per cent" sure that the Israeli Mossad was responsible for the operation.

Lieberman reportedly said that there wasn't "even one story indicating that Israel was implicated in the assassination. If anyone other than the media would have claimed otherwise, we would have addressed the issue, but as that there are no such allegations, there is no need to address it further."

Lieberman was scheduled to meet British Foreign Minister David Miliband later in the day, where he was also expected to be asked about the alleged use of fake United Kingdom passports in the January assassination in Dubai.

Both Miliband and Martin have made strong statements in recent days condemning the forging of passports and theft of identities. It was unclear what message Lieberman would offer at the meetings, though sources say the foreign minister was likely to claim that no evidence exists tying Israel to the hit.

Earlier Monday, European Union foreign ministers condemned the use of forged European passports by assassins who killed the Palestinian militant in Dubai, but made no direct reference to Israel.

Diplomatic sources said that the statement was intended to censure Israel over its alleged involvement in the killing of Mabhouh last month – though other senior European sources said the statement would not formally link Israel with the assassination or the forging of passports.

Israel has declined to confirm or deny any involvement.

"The EU strongly condemns the fact that those involved in this action [assassination] used fraudulent EU member states' passports and credit cards acquired through the theft of EU citizens' identities," a declaration on behalf of EU foreign ministers said.

Another senior diplomat said EU ambassadors had been summoned for consultations by Foreign Ministry officials in Abu Dhabi, the capital of the United Arab Emirates.

During the meeting, Abu Dhabi officials requested that EU foreign ministers issue a communique over the use of European passports in the Mabhouh operation. The UAE is also demanding an explicit EU statement supporting the Emirates' authorities who are investigating the case.

According to the European source, the UAE government did not blame Israel for carrying out the assassination, nor did it request that Israel be cited in the EU statement.

The source added that senior officials from Germany, France, Britain, Ireland and the EU met Sunday to agree on the language of the statement. Ireland is advocating the hardest line among all EU members by demanding that the statement explicitly refer to Israel.

According to the European source, the communique would include three key elements: the EU's condemnation of the use of European passports by members of the assassination team, an expression of support for the UAE government and investigators in Dubai, and a commitment to investigate the passport forgeries and theft identities as quickly as possible.

Meanwhile, the commander of the Dubai police revealed additional details about the Jan. 20 assassination.

The police official, Dahi Khalfan, said the police had information that would not be disclosed currently but which related to the use by some of the assassins of diplomatic passports to enter Dubai.

The Dubai police chief added that some of the hit squad had been in the emirate for at least a year before the killing and used the same passports. He made the remarks to Al-Bayan, a newspaper published in the UAE.

Khalfan said the information that led to the killing of Mabhouh came from an associate of a senior Hamas official, according to a statement published in another UAE newspaper, Al-Khaleej. Khalfan has been reported as saying the associate gave information about Mabhouh's arrival in Dubai.

Hamas officials criticized Mabhouh's conduct. Hamas legislator Salah Bardawil said Mabhouh endangered himself by ordering airline tickets over the Internet and said the senior Hamas official even notified Mabhouh's family about where in Dubai Mabhouh was staying. Mabhouh's brother, however, denied that the family had received such information. For their part, Hamas spokesmen denied the Dubai police chief's account.

One spokesman, Sami Abu Zahari, denied there was an informant in Hamas. Another senior Hamas official criticized the Dubai authorities for failing to sufficiently involve the group in their investigation.

Moreover, Arab media reported yesterday that the UAE has asked Egypt to officially lodge a protest with Israel over the assassination, as well as the alleged participation of two Palestinians who were arrested in connection with the hit.

Abu Dhabi's national security adviser met over the weekend with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. UAE officials said the arrested Palestinians were former members of the Palestinian Authority security apparatus.

Israel demands embargo on Iran oil

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called on Monday for an immediate embargo on Iran's energy sector, saying the United Nations Security Council should be sidestepped if it can't agree on the move.

Iran's uranium enrichment, in defiance of several rounds of Security Council sanctions, has spurred world powers to consider tougher diplomatic measures, against the backdrop of threatened military action by Israel as a last resort.

Netanyahu told foreign Jewish leaders that if the world "is serious about stopping Iran, then what it needs to do is not watered-down sanctions, moderate sanctions… but effective, biting sanctions that curtail the import and export of oil into Iran."

"This is what is required now. It may not do the job, but nothing else will, and at least we will have known that it was tried. And if this cannot pass in the Security Council, then it should be done outside the Security Council, but immediately."

Many western diplomats believe that China, along with fellow veto-wielder Russia, would oppose sanctions targeting Iran's energy sector. Proposed sanctions for now focus on Iranian government assets such as the Revolutionary Guard Corps.

Iran, the world's fifth-largest oil exporter, says its uranium enrichment is for peaceful energy needs. But the fierce anti-Israel rhetoric from Tehran and threats of Israeli military action have stirred fears of a regional war.

Netanyahu made no reference in his speech to the possibility that Israel would try to attack Iran's nuclear sites.

Iran has earmarked potential sites for new nuclear enrichment plants and construction of two of them could begin this year, an Iranian nuclear energy official said Monday.

"We have earmarked close to 20 sites and have passed the report on those to the president, however, these sites are only potential," Ali Akbar Salehi, head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, was quoted as saying on the news agency ISNA.

"We should begin the construction of two enrichment sites next year… In the two new sites, we plan to use new centrifuges." The next Iranian year begins on March 21.

Iran announced plans in November to build 10 new enrichment plants to match its existing Natanz complex. The announcement came as the United States and its allies hoped to reach an agreement for Iran to enrich uranium abroad.

Washington fears Iran's nuclear energy program will allow Tehran to develop nuclear weapons. Iran denies any such intention and says it only wants to generate electricity.

Salehi said President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad would announce on April 9 what kind of centrifuges will be used at the new sites.

The United States and its allies hope to get new UN sanctions imposed on Iran in the coming weeks over its continued enrichment work.

The head of U.S. Central Command, Gen. David Petraeus, told NBC's Meet the Press on Sunday that the United States is placing its efforts to thwart the Iranian nuclear program on a "pressure track."

Petraeus said he thought that "no one at the end of this time can say that the United States and the rest of the world have not given Iran every opportunity to resolve the issues diplomatically."

"That puts us in a solid foundation now to go on what is termed the pressure track," the U.S. general said, adding that "that's the course on which we are embarked now."

Longtime MK Rabbi Menachem Porush dies

JTA

JERUSALEM — Thousands attended the funeral of long-serving Knesset member Rabbi Menachem Porush.

Rabbi Porush died at his home in Jerusalem late Sunday evening at age 94. He was buried Monday afternoon in Jerusalem's Mount of Olives cemetery.

Rabbi Porush, father of current Deputy Education Minister Meir Porush, served in the Knesset as a member of the Agudat Israel and later the United Torah Judaism parties for 35 years until 1994, but remained politically active for the rest of his life.

He was a writer and editor for religious newspapers in the 20 years before entering the Knesset in 1959.

Rabbi Menachem Porush

"The Jewish People have lost a dear, wise and warm man who loved his people and was among its most dedicated public servants," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in a statement released from his office. "We mourn his passing."

"His big and merciful heart suddenly stopped, but his activities will forever be remembered," said President Shimon Peres. "The rabbi was a rare man, a distinguished Jew, like one of the Western Wall stones in the Holy City. He did not waste a minute of his life and gave his all to serve the public, the country and the Jewish people."

Israel is Americans' fifth favourite place

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — With all due respect to Washington's special relationship with Israel, Americans much prefer their neighbour to the north.

According to a new Gallup poll released over the weekend, Israel ranks fifth among the countries viewed most favourably by Americans, behind Canada, Great Britain, Germany and Japan.

A mere 10 per cent of Americans said they had a favourable view of Iran, which came in last place among a list of 20 nations. The survey was conducted among a random sampling of 1,025 respondents.

Americans' perception of the Palestinian Authority has vacillated over the course of the last decade. In 2005, 27 per cent of Americans held a favourable view, but that number dropped to 11 per cent following Hamas' election victory in 2006.

In 2009, the PA's favourable rating recovered to 15 per cent, and this year it increased further, to 20 per cent. However, 70 per cent of Americans still said they held an unfavourable view of the PA.

With regard to the foreign countries most often mentioned in the news, American public opinion did not significantly change with the Obama administration's assumption of power.

Canada remains Americans' favourite country, with an approval rating of 90 per cent. That compares to approval ratings of 87 per cent for Britain, 80 per cent for Germany, 77 per cent for Japan and 67 per cent for Israel.

The poll also revealed the generational and ideological gaps that affect Americans' views on foreign policy. According to Gallup, most countries were viewed more favourably by Americans aged 18 to 34 than by those aged 55 and older.

Israel is the only country that received more favourable views from Republicans; Gallup said. The PA, in contrast, received more support from Democrats.

The nations with the lowest favourability ratings in the poll included Afghanistan (18 per cent), the PA (20 per cent), Yemen (21 per cent), Iraq (23 per cent), Pakistan (23 per cent), Cuba (29 per cent) and Saudi Arabia (35 per cent).

Yemen was included in the survey for the first time after the suspect in the Christmas Day attack against a Detroit-bound airliner was linked to a Yemen-based terrorist group linked with Al Qaeda.

Mexico garnered a favourable rating of only 49 per cent, a two-point drop that is most likely attributable to the drug-fuelled gang wars that are plaguing America's neighbour to the south. This is the first time since 1993 that less than 50 per cent of Americans have seen Mexico in a positive light.

PA settles with terror victim

The Palestinian Authority settled a lawsuit for an undisclosed amount with the widow of an American killed in Israel in 2002. Papers were filed last month requesting the suit be dropped since the conditions of the settlement written last October had been met, Politico reported this week. The suit was brought by Leslye Knox, whose husband, Aharon Ellis, was gunned down at a bat mitzvah party in Hadera. The Al Aksa Brigades, linked to the Palestinian Authority's ruling Fatah Party, claimed responsibility for the act, allegedly carried out by a PA security officer. The payment is a reversal of the Palestinian Authority's previous years of refusal to meet lawsuits filed by victims' families. During the Bush administration, the PA sought intervention from the executive branch, claiming that suits such as the Knox case eventually would bankrupt the PA's leadership as it tried to exert itself over Hamas.

Rehab experts to Haiti

Israeli medical experts in the rehabilitation of amputees arrived in Haiti to help examine and evaluate injured victims from the devastating earthquake. The medical professionals from Alyn Hospital, an Israeli rehabilitation centre in Jerusalem for physically disabled children and adolescents, arrived in Haiti last Wednesday under the auspices of IsraAID, a co-ordinating body of Israeli and Jewish relief organizations and other interested parties based in Israel. The team will examine and evaluate the type and number of injuries and amputations, as well as assess the abilities of the medical staff in Haiti to carry out the rehabilitation of its people. "We are terribly saddened by the heartbreaking number of amputees in Haiti, but are grateful for the opportunity to be a part of IsraAID's mission so that we can lend our expertise in rehabilitation to the people who need it most," said Dr. Shirley Meyer, director-general of Alyn Hospital. "Our therapists will make a ground assessment of the rehabilitation and resources needed. Meyer said that Alyn would provide rehabilitation to Haitian children and training to the island nation's medical professionals if a decision is made to bring them to Israel.

Israelis abroad goodwill ambassadors

A new campaign will turn Israeli citizens into goodwill ambassadors for Israel abroad. The Ministry for Public Diplomacy and the Diaspora has started an initiative to teach Israelis how to present Israel positively. The initiative includes pamphlets given to Israeli passengers leaving Ben-Gurion International Airport, a website and training workshops across the country. The trainees will include ordinary citizens, as well as businessmen, celebrities, athletes, youth groups participants and politicians, among others. "To counter the vast sums of money invested by Arab states in propaganda against Israel, we have to mobilize our human capital, meaning the residents of Israel," Information Minister Yuli Edelstein said in a statement. A poll commissioned by the ministry found that 91 per cent of the 495 Jewish Israelis surveyed believed that Israel has a bad or very bad image abroad. Some 85 per cent said they would want to help represent Israel when they are abroad. Three million Israelis go abroad each year.

Teens riot during army drill

A soldier and two Border Police officers were injured when teens from the town of Yitzhar, in the West Bank, rioted, believing an army exercise was an eviction. Some 30 teens threw rocks and bottles filled with paint at Israeli soldiers and other Israeli security forces last week in the middle of an exercise aimed at defending Israeli communities against terrorist attacks, according to the Israel Defence Forces. The exercise took place at Yitzhar, located near Nablus. The teens also blocked the community's gate to prevent the security forces from leaving. In addition to the injuries, several military vehicles were damaged, according to the IDF. The IDF had cleared the exercise with community leaders, according to reports. "The IDF condemns tonight's events, and will take severe measures against those involved," an IDF statement said.

Germany: Iran must pay for its nuclear defiance

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BERLIN — Iran's failure to comply with the wishes of the United Nations over its nuclear program is forcing the international community to pursue further sanctions against Tehran, the German government said on Friday.

"The persistent defiance...of United Nations resolutions and Tehran's continuation of a dangerous nuclear policy are forcing the international community to pursue further comprehensive sanctions in New York against the regime in Tehran," government spokesman Ulrich Wilhelm told a regular news conference.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel was still "extending her hand" towards Iran and remained committed to reaching a diplomatic solution, Wilhelm told a regular news conference.

"We rule out a military solution," he said.

Germany's comments came as Russia's Foreign Ministry said last week that Iran must more actively co-operate with the UN nuclear agency, the IAEA, to convince the world that its nuclear program is peaceful, Interfax news agency reported.

"Tehran must be more active in its co-operation with the IAEA and widen it," Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman Andrei Nesterenko was quoted as saying at a briefing in Moscow.

Iran said on Friday that charges in a recently leaked IAEA report claiming the Islamic republic was attempting to develop nuclear weapons were "nothing new but tiresome."

"The West's accusations are baseless because our religious beliefs bar us from using such weapons ... we do not believe in atomic weapons and are not seeking that," Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei was quoted as saying on state television.

In its report, the IAEA said that it had concerns that Iran is currently working on a nuclear warhead. The IAEA said the Islamic Republic will not allow inspectors access to heavy water activities – heavy water is used in nuclear reactors – and has not sufficiently explained possible military activities, such as exploding high-powered detonators, that could be used in making a nuclear device.

The report also said that uranium particles found by the IAEA in Syria show that a site bombed by Israel in 2007 could have been a nuclear reactor. It was the first time the Vienna-based organization has used such phrasing in one of its reports, which had so far referred to past activities.

"The issues related to alleged studies regarding missiles raised in the latest IAEA report had also been raised in previous IAEA reports and are therefore nothing new but gradually becoming tiresome," Iran's IAEA envoy Ali-Asghar Soltanieh told ISNA news agency.

The Iranian envoy also claimed the new IAEA chief, Yukiya Amano, confirmed the peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear projects.

President Shimon Peres said that Israel must form a broad international coalition to face the Iranian nuclear threat, adding that it wasn't a question of who has nuclear weapons bur rather what it intends to do with that arsenal.

Speaking at the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations in Jerusalem, Peres said that to "curb Iran's nuclear ambitions Israel must create a broad coalition of nations that can face the Iranian threat."

"The question isn't who has the bomb, but who has executioners," Peres said, adding that "the Iranians are executioners who are trying to get a bomb, and it's time we called the executioner by his name, and call a dictator a dictator.

In related developments, the United States reportedly is preparing a new National Intelligence Estimate that will portray Iran as more aggressively pursuing nuclear weapons.

Iran continues to enrich uranium and has announced plans to substantively expand enrichment.

Film producer Christina Fon gravitates toward Aboriginal issues

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Movie producer Christina Fon is co-producer of Reel Injun, a documentary by Cree filmmaker Neil Diamond that traces the evolution of Hollywood's portrayal of North American Aboriginal Peoples from the silent era to the present day.

The film – which opened in Toronto and Vancouver on Feb. 19 and will be broadcast by CBC on March 28 – explains through archival clips and interviews how stereotypical depictions of native people have affected their self-image.

The topic has a certain resonance for Fon, a 42-year-old Canadian of Jewish Hungarian extraction.

"I'm a first-generation Canadian whose parents lived through persecution and anti-Semitism during World War II," said Fon, one of the principals of Montreal-based Rezolution Pictures International.

"My father wore the yellow star, and I was raised in a household that promoted empathy for all oppressed cultures," she added in an interview.

To Fon, who has produced a slew of films on Native issues since joining Rezolution Pictures International almost a decade ago, Jews and Aboriginals share an important connection.

"The most obvious one is the persecution and the displacement," said Fon, whose parents, John and Agnes, met in Montreal after separately immigrating to Canada in 1956.

"Native people are very funny. They have the ability to laugh at themselves even in the most difficult and painful situations. This is one of the things that has kept them going throughout their history. Jewish people can relate to this. I can relate to this. I was brought up in a family that definitely used humour to deal with many horrific situations."

Christina Fon

Fon rates Reel Injun as her "proudest achievement." As she put it, "When you produce a film about an oppressed minority, you bear the weight of that responsibly. You've got to get it right."

As she discovered to her surprise, some of the Aboriginal talking heads in the film are of partial Jewish ancestry, including Jesse Wente, a Toronto movie critic, and musician Robbie Robertson, formerly of The Band, who in recent years has become a Hollywood composer.

A graduate of Concordia University who majored in communications, Fon has produced or co-produced a plethora of award-winning films on Aboriginals in the past nine years.

The River, set on a fictional Native reservation on the Canada-U.S. border where a crime family runs a smuggling operation, will be broadcast on the Movie Network and Movie Central in the near future.

Club Native, filmed in the Mohawk community of Kahnawake, explored the question of who exactly is a Native.

Rez Rides took viewers inside two very different Native custom car shops, while Mohawk Girls explored the lives of teenage girls in Kahnawake.

In addition, she produced three seasons of Dab Iyiyuu/Absolutely Cree, which focused on the legends and wilderness skills of elders; One More River, which told the story of a Cree referendum on a contentious hydro-dam project, and Moose TV, the first all-Native comedy series, which starred Adam Beach.

Fon has also produced general interest films.

Mommy Mommy is about the trials and tribulations of a lesbian couple who want to adopt a child. The Last Explorer, a docudrama about revenge and forbidden love, takes place in the heart of rugged Labrador. Heavy Metal: A Mining Disaster in Northern Quebec looks at a small community devastated and tested by toxic mining waste.

Fon launched her career in Vancouver as an assistant director. "I worked in Vancouver for about two years and returned to Montreal, homesick, as a freelancer to work on various films."

As far as she is concerned, she was lucky to join Rezolution International Pictures.

"The freelance life was not for me," said Fon, a mother of two whose husband, Alfonso Maiorana, is a cinematographer.

Her co-principals at Rezolution Pictures International are Ernest Webb, who was raised in a Cree community; Catherine Bainbridge, a Torontonian who was a print journalist and television host, and Linda Ludwick, a Winnipegger who brings expertise in production and finance to the mix.

"In Webb, Bainbridge and Ludwick, I found a group of people who were not 'industry types' but creative people who wanted to do work that made a difference. Native, Irish, Jewish and gay. That's us. Despite the diversity of our backgrounds, we function as a single unit. It's a rare blessing when your best friends are also cherished creative partners."

Provocative play deals with Mideast conflict

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Michael Nathanson's Talk is about the collapse of a friendship between a Jewish man and his non-Jewish friend in the aftermath of 9-11.

The provocative Governor General Award-nominated play is being staged in Toronto at the St. Lawrence Centre for The Arts next month.

The Jewish man, Josh, is played by Michael Rubenfeld, and Kevin Bundy has the role of his non-Jewish friend, Gordon.

During their 18-year friendship, the two have never discussed Middle East politics and religion. But one day, when Gordon's girlfriend drops the word "Palestine" in conversation, in reference to a scarf she's wearing, the men's friendship begins to break down, as Gordon reveals he's become very pro-Palestinian

"The play for me is a love story between two friends that dissipates as a result of politics," Rubenfeld says. "What is so fantastic about the play from my perspective is that it is asking us to look at the Middle East conflict with a very diasporan perspective, which is very complicated and is one that is often very black and white. One, that many people have a hard time understanding... Jews and non-Jews alike."

Rubenfeld wants audiences to leave the theatre with a greater understanding of the complexity of the situation in Israel, and also how the conflict is affecting everyone around the world.

Jeremy Hotz's act revolves around his 'miserable' life

By PAUL TELNER AND BYRON PASCOE
Special to The CJN

"Shouldn't it be written right to left?" Jeremy Hotz said during an interview with The CJN.

Canadian Jewish comedian Jeremy Hotz's act revolves around his misery with, well, just about everything.

"I went to Hillel Academy in Ottawa for six years," Hotz said. "That traumatic experience is solely responsible for my career."

His miserable attitude is what brings him on a cross-Canada tour from Feb. 25 to March 13, appropriately titled Jeremy Hotz... It's the Most Miserable Time of the Year Tour. Audiences can expect "more of the miserable stuff that happens to me every day that people find funny," he said. He considers the beach to be the most miserable thing about this time of year in Canada.

His tour will take him from Ottawa to Vancouver, except for some "miserable" cities, that is. The Canadian cities that he finds most miserable are "Red Deer and Moose Jaw, cities that feel the need to include animal names in their title."

If he wasn't a comedian, Jeremy knows exactly what he would be doing with his life. "I would be a plumber. I love to plumb," he said.

The comedian has appeared on screen in a variety of TV series, including a recurring role on the CBC show The Newsroom, and many standup showcases.

He recently shot a pilot for a reality show. "I have a new sitcom in about my miserable life," he said.

As a seasoned comedian, Hotz said the most exciting part of the business has been that "it has afforded me the opportunity to date women well out of my league." The most disappointing part is that "I can't afford women well out of my league," he added.

Many comedians use Twitter and Facebook as ways to get their comedy out. Hotz thinks social networks are definitely a positive for comedy. "Yes. Join my Facebook page. And if you're a single girl well out of my league, I've recently run into a bit of money," he said.

Hotz, who has has appeared on the Letterman and Leno shows, also weighs in on the recent late-show wars. "Conan [O'Brien] won in the end. I wish someone paid me $8 million for just standing there."

Hotz won two Canadian Comedy Awards: the Dave Broadfoot Comic Genius Award 2008 and an award for the best male standup in 2009. He received a Gemini for The Newsroom, and he was nominated for one for the best writing in a comedy or variety show or series for his special, Whatever Happened to Jeremy Hotz? He's still pretty miserable.

Hotz's most memorable gig was playing the Playboy Mansion, which he said was also his worst gig.

When asked about the moment when he truly felt as if he'd made it in comedy, he responded in typical Hotz fashion, "When it happens, I'll let you know."

Hotz's tour brings him to Hamilton, Toronto, Ottawa, Edmonton and other cities. For more information, visit www.hahaha.com/JeremyHotz, and if you're a single woman well out of Jeremy's league, visit www.facebook.com/JeremyHotz.

Names in the News: Amy Winehouse plans to attend her family's Passover seder this year but hopefully won't drink any of the four traditional cups of wine, according to an interview with her father, Mitch Winehouse, in London's Jewish Chronicle. The 26-year-old singer, who's known for her eclectic mix of R&B, soul, jazz and ska, and who's had heavy problems with drugs and alcohol, is trying to kick her self-destructive habits.

The story also reveals that Mitch Winehouse, a 59-year-old cab driver, has recorded an album of popular songs that will soon be released. "I've always sung in the house, and Amy and I first spoke about my doing an album five years ago," he said. "But then she wasn't well, and I just didn't have the koyech for it. Now that she is well into her recovery, I decided I could do it." The piece further relates that Amy idolized her grandmother, Bubbie Cynthia, a "former jazz singer with Elizabeth Taylor looks" who "was clearly the model for Amy's love of big hair, eyeliner and performance itself."

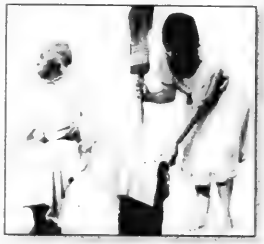
Literary Awards

• Kim Ablon Whitney, author of The Other Half of Life, a work of historical fiction based on the ill-fated voyage of the MS St. Louis, has won the 2009 U.S. National Jewish Book Award in children's and young adult literature. The St. Louis sailed from Germany in May 1939 with some 950 Jewish refugees who were refused entry in Cuba, United States and Canada, and ultimately forced to return to Europe, with tragic consequences. The publisher is Alfred A. Knopf.

• The Importance of Wings, by Robin Friedman, a coming-of-age novel about an Israeli girl whose family relocates to Staten Island, won in the older readers' category in the 2010 Sydney Taylor Book Awards for Jewish children's literature, administered by the Association of Jewish Libraries. Tropical Secrets: Holocaust Refugees of Cuba, by Margarita Engle, won the highest award in the teen category.

The Varsity Jews perform at Beth Radom Congregation Feb. 28



Odysseus Chaoticus at the Al Green Theatre March 4.

• Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, of the United Hebrew Congregations of the British Commonwealth, has won the 2009 (U.S.) National Jewish Book Award, modern Jewish thought and experience, for Covenant & Conversation: A Weekly Reading of the Jewish Bible, Genesis: The Book of Beginnings, published by OU Press and Maggid Books. The book offers a collection of essays on the weekly Torah portion, reflecting Rabbi Sacks' sophisticated approach to life lived in an ongoing dialogue with the Torah. Sacks also wrote the introduction and commentary to the Koren Sacks Siddur, which was one of the finalists in the awards.

Passages: Helen Weinzweig, who won a Toronto Book Award in 1981 for her second novel, Basic Black With Pearls, has died in Toronto, at age 94. The Polish-born writer came to Toronto as a girl, with her mother, and was married to the famed Canadian composer John Weinzweig, who died in 2006.

Weinzweig did not begin writing until she was in her late 40s. "One of the drawbacks of starting when you're older is you know what good writing is, and you know you can't do it," she once said. "You have standards in your mind that can never be met." She was also nominated for a Governor General's Award for fiction for her short story collection, A View from the Roof. She is survived by her sons, Paul and Daniel.

Play deals with friendships and politics

"Today, no matter who you are, you now have a relationship with the Middle East. When I was growing up, it wasn't like that."

He says his relationship with Israel has shifted in his adult life. More and more people are pro-Palestinian, and the perspectives are very black and white.

"In some ways, for me it has just made things less clear because Israel is a country I grew up learning to love and I've been to Israel."

Rubenfeld says that today a lot of Jews are becoming anti-Israel and he's not sure how he feels.

"I need to live in a world that I can still love Israel and not agree with everything its government does, but still believe it is a necessity to exist, because my family were Holocaust survivors. If there was a country back then, there would be a lot more Jews alive in the world."

Rubenfeld was instrumental in getting Nathanson's play published by the Playwrights Canada Press, which led to its Governor General Award nomination.

Rubenfeld is a 2001 acting graduate from the National Theatre School in Montreal. He is the co-founder and co-artistic director of Absit Omen Theatre with playwright Hannah Moscovitch. In 2008, he was hired as the artistic producer of Toronto's annual SummerWorks Theatre Festival.

Michael Rubenfeld

Rubenfeld plans to tour The Book of Judith, a play he created with Sarah Stanley, internationally. His body of work also includes Present Tense, Spain and My Fellow Creatures.

While rehearsing Talk this month, Rubenfeld spent his nights acting in Yichud at Toronto's Theatre Passe Muraille. He's currently working on a screenplay with Josh Reichmann, formerly of the band Tangiers, and finishing a musical with Moscovitch.

Talk, produced by the Harld Green Jewish Theatre Company and directed by Ted Dykstra, runs from March 3 to 20. For tickets, call 416-366-7723.

Canadian sitcom premieres its second season

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Sheldon Blecher is fat. Josh is a narcissist. Their father is abrasive and their mother is a pyromaniac.

And Marvin Kaye can relate.

Kaye is the co-creator of Less Than Kind, a Canadian television show based loosely on his life growing up in Winnipeg with his Jewish family.

The sitcom, which features the Blechers and their family-run driving school, premiered its second season on HBO Canada on Feb. 19 and is currently in development for its third.

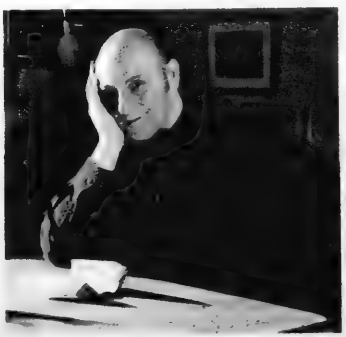
Although the show originally premiered on Citytv's in 2008, the concept was born in the mid 1990s as a one-act play, called They Have Mayonnaise in Montreal.

"The play was produced and had a pretty good run," Kaye said. "It just sort of sat on the shelf. Years later, I hit my mid 30s and me and my friend Chris [Sheasgreen, the show's co-creator] decided we needed to figure out what we'd do with our lives, besides be starving actors, which was becoming a little boring."

After pitching the show to various networks, Kaye and Sheasgreen ended up working with the production company Breakthrough Films and Television.

So far, the show has won two Canadian Comedy Awards and was nominated for nine Gemini Awards.

For Kaye, the key to a successful show is creating relatable characters.



Marvin Kay

"To give these characters heart, you have to give them a little bit of your humanity," he said. "Those characters were based on my life and growing up in Winnipeg and those family relationships."

Kaye, whose real life family owned a driving school, sees himself as Sheldon, played by Jesse Camacho, who's a smart, awkward overweight teenager that's constantly being made fun of by his handsome, self-absorbed brother Josh, played by Benjamin Arthur.

"I based it on my perspective," he said. "They're all these crazy family members and they have a tough time relating to each other, but the fact that their family is so strong...you forgive a lot of those foibles and mistakes."

The show's tone can be summarized by its theme song – One Great City by the Weakerthans. The theme song's last line is "I hate Winnipeg."

"It talks about the city in a fond way. It had a back-handed compliment. We kept coming back to [the song]. It seemed right. It had the same tone in it, it had a sentimentality to it, but it was kind of harsh."

The show may be a comedy, but the second season will get much darker than the first, Kaye said.

While Less Than Kind explores failed acting careers and dating disasters, it also delves into issues of mortality as Sheldon's father, Sam Blecher, played by Maury Chaykin, faces a near-death experience. Well, several near-death experiences, as he dies and comes back to life three times in the season premiere.

For Kaye, the show is about balancing the line between tragedy and comedy.

"I think life does that too. That was sort of our intention. The sweet spot was to get someone laughing and crying within several minutes of each other. If you can do that, that's a special spot to be in," he said.

While the show is based on Kaye's life, most plot lines aren't.

"The story eventually gets a life of its own. We have to wave reality goodbye," he said. "There's things that happened in the show that have never happened in my life, but we try to keep it rooted in a real human place."

Kaye, who has toured with the theatre company Shakespeare in the Rough and appeared in films like The Perfect Man and Undercover Brother, also worked on the production side of television in shows like Puppets Who Kill and Little Mosque on the Prairie.

Norman Levine's last book

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

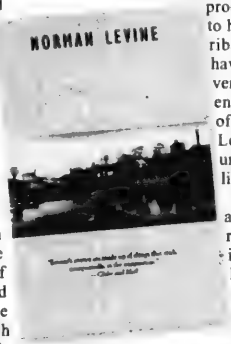
Norman Levine's career was among the strangest of the major postwar Canadian Jewish writers. Although he spent little time in Canada after his stint in the Canadian Air Force during World War II, and much of his fiction is set in England, he continued to be thought of as a Canadian writer, and in the last years of his life, he received the kind of attention and awards that evaded him in his more active years.

Norman Ravvin

Born in Ottawa in 1923, Levine was raised by his Polish-born parents in Lower Town, a French-speaking neighbourhood where Jewish peddlers like his father, selling from a horse-drawn cart, were a common sight.

Levine wrote his first novel, The Angled Road, while studying at McGill, and it was short-lived graduate work at King's College London that introduced him to the English creative milieu where he spent the bulk of his life. A summer in Cornwall proved a turning point, for it was there that he befriended painters – among them Francis Bacon – and writers, who influenced his fiction. Levine's career began in little magazines, but his stories found a home in Vogue and Harper's Bazaar in an era when short story writing was a feasible way to support a writing life and a family.

Levine's last book, The Ability to Forget (Lester & Orpen Denys), appeared in 2003, a few years before he died. Like previous collections, published to limited popular success, it is a remarkable book – sad, full of beautiful descriptive writing and crisply reported talk revealing his characters' disjointed lives. A number of the stories in the book are set around Cornwall, and they evoke the curious character of towns like St. Ives and Penzance, where British artists and writers went to pursue their work, finding themselves cut off from the broader English scene and surrounded by the trappings of a somewhat down-at-the-heels seaside tourist culture.



Levine often acknowledged the influence of abstract painters on his writerly craft, and it is in the coastal scenes in stories like Tricks that his ability to build a story around painterly images shines through: "On a bright morning I set off for an estate in West Cornwall. I took the train to Penzance. Then a green country bus. It went slowly up a steep road. At the top it levelled out. We were on an open moor. It was exhilarating. I could see for miles. A brilliant blue sky. Haunches of earth with gorse and bracken and scattered granite boulders. The only sign that people were about – a row of wooden telegraph poles, by the road, carrying a single wire."

But The Ability to Forget returns, in a number of stories, to material linked with Levine's upbringing as an outsider in Ottawa, to depictions of his narrator's aging mother, to the grown men who were his boyhood companions in Lower Town, so that the Jewish inflection of his personality and past come clearer than they have in previous collections.

It is fascinating to see how differently Levine handles material that has been made familiar by other writers: the hardscrabble downtown Jewish economy; immigrants and postwar refugees at a loss in their New World lives. In Lower Town mines Ottawa's vanished Jewish neighbourhood, where the narrator's father, who "knew a few words of English and a few words of French" sells produce from his red horse-drawn wagon to housewives who cannot understand his ribald Yiddish jokes. Many years later, having moved to England to "put all this very far behind," Levine's narrator experiences a change of heart: "Now that most of the fruit and rag peddlers are dead and Lower Town has changed – I find I am unable to stay away from it. It's become like a magnet. Whenever I can, I return."

Unlike Mordecai Richler, Levine almost never mines such material for rough humour or satiric ends. Often there is the pain of loss and a sense of rootlessness at the heart of his recollections, and Canada itself is depicted as a place where whole ways of life are swept away. At the end of In Lower Town, the narrator visits his mother and describes the walk he took to get to her apartment: "They're knocking the wooden houses down," he tells her. "And changing the streets. Soon there will be nothing left of the place the way it was." This pleases the narrator's mother, who admires the new highrise across her street and begs her son, "You won't write any more about fruit and rag peddlers?"

Norman Levine's final book makes great fictional leaps, between the sunsets at Penzance and the eclipse of an old style of Canadian Jewish life. The fruit and rag peddlers of his father's world – itinerant outsiders, ironists who tell jokes in a foreign language – begin to look like models for the kind of man Levine became, and for the characters who people his sharp, darkly suggestive stories.

Norman Ravvin's books include Hidden Canada: An Intimate Travelogue and the forthcoming novel, The Joyful Child. He is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Free speech at issue in campus Israel wars

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — In the wake of the arrests of 11 University of California, Irvine, students for disrupting a speech by the Israeli ambassador to the United States, Shalom Elcott, the president and chief executive of the Jewish Federation of Orange County, Calif., threw down the gauntlet.

UC-Irvine has long been caught in the thicket of the Israel wars, its campus notorious in the pro-Israel community for the intensity and often confrontational quality of discourse on the Middle East. But while some Jewish groups have pushed the administration to condemn inflammatory speakers sponsored by Muslim students, the university previously had been willing only to issue generic condemnations of hate speech on campus.

This time, the Jewish community will "intensely monitor" the response of the university, Elcott told JTA.

"While it's nice to condemn hate speech in general, we expect a very specific response from the University of California leadership based on what transpired in that room," he said.

In addition to prosecuting the students "to the fullest extent of the law," Elcott told JTA he expects future activities of the Muslim Students Union to be closely scrutinized and would like to see their programming stripped of public funding.

Civil discourse on college campuses, or the lack thereof, has been a source of concern for some time. But two distinct strategies are now taking shape, seemingly informed by the recourse available to both sides.

Jewish groups increasingly are pressing their case directly with universities and relevant government agencies, serving notice to university leaders and major donors that they expect strict enforcement of campus codes of conduct. Some even have sought to have speakers disinvited whose views are deemed beyond the pale.

Meanwhile, Israel's critics have stepped up efforts to actively disrupt speakers defending the Jewish state.

The differing tactics in many ways reflect the methods that Israelis and Palestinians, by virtue of their power differential, have been led to adopt in their own confrontations.

Jewish groups, possessed of greater political and financial strength, have sought to exert pressure on an institutional level, seeking governmental investigations and leveraging relationships with university officials and their deep-pocketed supporters. Pro-Palestinian groups, generally outmatched at that game, have employed methods more reminiscent of guerrilla politics – disrupting speeches, creating political theatre on campuses and being arrested.

Last week, the Zionist Organization of America called for donors to stop supporting UC-Irvine and for Jewish and non-Jewish students not to apply there.

Such tactics have surfaced at other campuses as well.

The Simon Wiesenthal Center issued a statement protesting an appearance scheduled for last week at New York University by Richard Goldstone, the South African Jewish jurist whose report on Israel's conduct of the 2008 Gaza war sparked vitriolic condemnations. In Philadelphia, several pro-Israel activists protested the decision by the Hillel chapter at the University of Pennsylvania to host an event organized by the group J Street, which backs U.S. pressure on Israel and the Palestinians. And across the state, in Pittsburgh, the roles were reversed: local J Street supporters initiated a campaign to stop the Hillel chapter from hosting a speech by Israeli hard-liner Effi Eitam.

Michael Oren

"There was a tremendous amount of pressure put on this organization, on a variety of levels, in an attempt to force us to cancel the event," said Aaron Weil, the local Hillel director in Pittsburgh.

For their part, pro-Palestinian students have repeatedly disrupted speeches by Israeli speakers, including one by Israel's deputy foreign minister, Danny Ayalon, at Oxford University recently. At UCLA, a coalition of pro-Palestinian student groups affixed duct tape to their mouths and disrupted a lecture by another Israeli official on the same night as Israeli Ambassador Michael Oren was nearly shouted down at Irvine. And at the University of Chicago, hecklers made it exceedingly difficult for former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert to speak in October, interrupting his talk repeatedly with cries of "war criminal."

Even as they seek to disrupt Israeli speakers, the pro-Palestinian students are being cast, by themselves and by some supporters, as representing the cause of free speech.

The Muslim Public Affairs Council has called for an investigation into the arrests at the UC-Irvine campus of the students who disrupted Oren's talk. A spokesperson for the group, Edina Lekovic, told JTA it was unclear exactly what law the students broke, and that there appeared to be a "selected application" of university policy.

Lekovic declined to comment directly on the acceptability of disrupting a public university lecture. But the Muslim Council's executive director, Salam Al-Marayati, seemed to defend those arrested, saying in a statement that the students "had the courage and conscience to stand up against aggression."

The students, Al-Marayati said, were exercising their First Amendment rights.

UC-Irvine's Muslim Student Union has maintained publicly that although its president, Mohamed Abdelgany, was among those arrested, the group did not orchestrate the disruptions. The MSU, however, has not condemned the disruptions either, even though it has long been a target of the ZOA – a campaign the student group has described as an effort to obstruct its right to free expression.

"It is ironic that the university would honour the representative of a country that brazenly stands 'above the law' and punish the students who would rightfully protest his presence as a representative of Israel's illegal and inhumane policies, including documented war crimes," Hadeer Soliman, the MSU spokesperson, said in an e-mail.

Hillel president Wayne Firestone joined the Ocean County federation in its call for a harsh reaction from the university.

Firestone, who in 2008 presided over a discussion in Washington about civil discourse that featured UC-Irvine chancellor Michael Drake, said he has been satisfied generally with the administrative response to such incidents. But he would like UC-Irvine to "come down hard" to send a message about the importance of civility on campus.

"I do believe that strong disciplinary procedures by the university, whether or not they're prosecuted criminally, is in order here," Firestone said.

Firestone also condemned efforts within the Jewish community to disinvite or disrupt speakers, saying it makes it harder for the community to press the importance of free speech.

Peer back in Israel after semifinal loss in Dubai

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — American tennis star Venus Williams defeated Shahar Peer in the semifinals of the Dubai Championships last week, but the Israeli, back on home soil, can breathe easier after emerging from the near-hermetic security detail that blanketed her throughout her improbable tournament run.

Peer, currently ranked 22nd in the world, will most likely return to the top 20 following her impressive showing in Dubai. She fell to Williams 6-4, 6-1 last Friday.

Upon her return to Israel on Sunday, she was more than satisfied with her overall performance, which was largely overshadowed by the stringent security measures that forced her matches off the centre court.

Peer's movements in Dubai were restricted to the court and a hotel, due to the organizers' security concerns. The Israeli, who last year was denied a visa by the United Arab Emirates (UAE) authorities, was surrounded by guards and played on the most secure peripheral court all week. Despite this, she defeated three seeds, including No. 1 Caroline Wozniacki.

"It was quite an experience from a number of different standpoints," Peer said as she was enthusiastically welcomed by a crowd of well-wishers at Ben-Gurion Airport.

"From a tennis standpoint as well as a psychological standpoint, it was really an experience that I'll never forget. This was a dream week in which almost everything came together at the right time. If someone were to ask me if I would've been happy with this result a while ago, I would've gladly taken it."

"One can say that [last week] was insane," she added.

Peer said she didn't really know what to expect in Dubai, the epicentre of a diplomatic and criminal imbroglio touched off by the recent assassination of a Hamas operative, an act that many believe was committed by Israel.

"Even if I try to describe the atmosphere there, it would require a few hours at least," Peer said.

Her confinement to isolation in her hotel room – where she wasn't even permitted to see her doubles partner until they both reached the court – helped her "concentrate on the things are really important," she said.

"I can't even speak of what it must be like [for her]," Williams said after Friday's victory over Peer. "She played so well this week."

Williams agreed to defend her title this year only if the Israeli player was admitted to the UAE.

That earned gratitude from Peer.

"I told her I really appreciate her support this week and last year," Peer said, adding that Williams took the decision to move Friday's match to a side court gracefully.

Peer's defensive approach failed to slow Williams, who raced to a 4-0 lead in the first set. Peer won the fifth game against serve, but Williams quickly extinguished the Israeli's hopes of a comeback by taking the final two games to win the set in just 23 minutes.

In the second set, the players traded breaks early before Williams secured a decisive second break in the seventh game. The American then survived five break points in the following game to go 5-3 up, and served out.

"She started very strong. She was all over me," Peer said. "I think I played a very good second set. I missed one or two chances, but overall it was good tennis."

Peer downplayed the controversy that resulted in a $300,000 (US) fine for the Dubai tournament last year, saying she was pleased with how the week had gone.

"I think I achieved a lot in this tournament, professionally and mentally," she said. "I've been going through a lot and I am really happy how I managed this week. I learned I am a very good player and I can be there at the top."

Williams retained her Dubai Championships crown by defeating Victoria Azarenka of Belarus 6-3 7-5 in the final. It was the third-seeded American's 42nd singles title, putting her one ahead of Justine Henin at the top of the list of active players.

Montreal girl is Paralympic torchbearer

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Montrealer Alison Levine is going to be a torchbearer on March 4 for the upcoming Paralympic Games.

Levine, 19, will be one of 600 Canadians around the country carrying the torch for the Paralympics, which begin March 12 in Vancouver at the same venues used for the Winter Olympics.

The Cote St. Luc resident and graduate of JPPS-Bialik will be accompanied by her close friend Tamar Eliashiv. They will head to Quebec City, one of 10 Canadian "celebration communities" where the Paralympic flame will be lit.

Levine, who uses a wheelchair because of a neurological condition, was astounded when Vancouver called her with the good news.

About 20 per cent of Paralympic torchbearers have disabilities.

Levine and other prospective torchbearers had to submit a 250-character entry as part of a contest sponsored by the Vancouver organizing committee for the 2010 Olympic and Paralympic Winter Games (VANOC).

The subject related to how being a torchbearer would "embody the Paralympic spirit," Levine said.

"I was really shocked," she said in a phone interview. "Shocked and very excited."

So were her parents, Roberta and Michael Levine, sister Amanda and other family and friends.

"Thanks for letting a proud Jewish mom share in her daughter's excitement," Roberta Levine said in an e-mail message to The CJN announcing the news.

Currently a special care counselling student at Vanier College, Levine said she would use a crutch under one arm and wield the Paralympic torch with the other. The Paralympic torch, which is manufactured by Bombardier, is exactly the same as the Olympic torch, except it's blue instead of white.

Levine is also being furnished with a Hudson Bay Company-issued, blue Paralympic torchbearer uniform, "which I get to keep," she said.

The uniform is emblazoned with the Paralympics symbol of three agitos (from the Latin word "agito," meaning "I move") and its torch relay emblem.

The Paralympic 2010 website says that "the Paralympic torch relay is one of the most important tools to increase awareness and communication for a Paralympic Games."

One main difference between the Olympic and Paralympic torch relays – which began in 1988 – is that the Paralympic flame "has no traditional starting place" such as Olympia, Greece.

For that reason, each relay team in each participating city or town is free to kindle the flame in its own way at its own celebratory lighting ceremony.

In addition, for the first time in its history, the Paralympic relay will be run in a "non-linear" way. The first lighting ceremony will have an aboriginal theme and take place March 3 on Parliament Hill in Ottawa with the participation of torchbearers representing each province and the territories.

Movies evoke memories

By MICHAEL GORDON

Most of us love movies. There's an international passion for film. The predicted demise of the movie theatre with the advent of television and DVDs has not turned out to be so. Every Monday, I hear on the radio a report of the top box office hits at movie theatres.

The Senior Side of Life

The constant flow of new movies, however, may hide the importance of old movies and their potential role in the lives of elders. In my geriatric practice, I often recommend to families that they play old movies they know their family member loved. This is a lot easier these days than it once was, with libraries and online means of ordering old movies.

My father, who is now 98, until recently when his ability to do so has waned, would watch certain movies over and over because he loved the story or the actors – one example is the 1995 movie, The Bridges of Madison County, even though this would not be classified as a truly old movie. He especially loved the role played by Meryl Streep.

I recently experienced the wonderful emotional power of old movies that I have a strong, positive memory of, and the powerful feelings that such movies can provoke. Two that I watched have strong associations because of my father.

After seeing the play Still Life by Noel Coward at this summer's Shaw festival, and Cyrano de Bergerac by Edmond Rostand at Stratford, I was motivated to find the copies of the 1945 movie Brief Encounters, based on Still Life, and the 1950 Cyrano movie based on the second play. The copies I purchased online were not re-mastered to contemporary technical quality, but the impact that each of them had on me was profound and moving.

I saw Brief Encounter for the first time with my father in the 1950s and recall the quiet in the theatre and the beautiful music that accompanied the film. I recognized the music, from Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto, as that was the first 45 rpm record set we ever owned, when this format began to replace the 78 rpms that had reigned for decades. The records I recall vividly were red vinyl and were played on a small changer that dropped the discs, which had a large central hole. The changer plugged into a large radio that either already had the ability to act as an amplifier or that my father arranged through his engineering knowledge to act as the amplifier.

I listened to that concerto over and over and became so attuned to the pauses between records that when I finally, years later, bought a 33 rpm version when I had the ability to do so, I could not understand initially why there were no pauses at certain places in the concerto as the full-sized record played on uninterrupted.

The Academy Award-winning Jose Ferrer role in Cyrano was the first movie I attended with my father where I witnessed him crying during a performance. It is a habit I must have inherited from him, and my children have remarked at my doing this over the years when we have seen films together.

I recently watched each of the movies, and the memories and tears evoked reminded me of those wonderful, moving childhood memories.

Memory can do this, and all of us should use our wonderful memories of those we love to their utmost to bring back special experiences that often mean so much to us and help define who we are and how we bond with each other.

Making sense of nutrition labels

Something people often find confusing is how to read a nutrition label and knowing what information to take away.

Nutrition labels contain a lot of information, but not all of it is relevant to everyone. Standards require that if you make claims about a vitamin, mineral or nutrient, then you must also include the values for others. So, what should you look at?

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

First, look at the serving size at the top to determine how many servings you are likely to eat. Then you know how many times you need to multiply the information, if at all.

Next, look at calories if you're trying to control your weight. And if you are trying to lose or maintain weight, or have heart health issues, look at fat, first total fat, then the breakdown. Avoid trans fat, but feel good about poly, mono and omega fats in moderation. Note: if there's a total of six grams of fat, and the breakdown of fats doesn't add up to six, something is hidden, usually small amounts of trans fat. It may say 0g, even if the product has up to 0.5g.

You may want to look at fibre content next. Your goal is 25g per day.

Depending on your health goals, look at the carbohydrates and sugar content. The total carbs will be a combination of starch, sugars and fibre. A serving of carbohydrates should be 15g. So if bread has 23g per slice, this slice is more like 1.5 servings.

Protein is another nutrient you may look at, though not all foods are meant to be high in protein.

Sodium is a big one. We should aim for only about 1,500 mg of sodium a day. Some foods are astronomically high, and the portion is very important to consider.

Lastly, look at vitamins and minerals, things like calcium, iron, vitamins C, D and A.

Choose the categories most relevant to you and focus on those.

Purim, balloons and hope

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Fortunately, a bubble can only burst once. Or can it?

I blew up a balloon for my son, Noah River. It was long and stringy, the type a balloon artist would use to create the wheels of an inflated car. We played balloon volleyball with it, tossing it about and watching as it bounced off cabinets, eventually landing on the point of a fork. Then boom! It burst.

URBAN WRITER

I picked it up to see if the shredded balloon might be salvaged. A little boy wanted the balloon to be awake again. Eventually, I succeeded in creating another balloon, albeit a smaller one with shreds of rubber hanging off of it.

Noah and I tossed it about again, hoping for a repeat of its former agility and liveliness. But alas! The new balloon flew, bounced and then quickly torpedoed downward rolling awkwardly and tiredly along the floor looking to forgo its responsibilities as a balloon.

Soon enough, it burst again – for a second time. Noah was again disappointed.

After the Holocaust, a depression took hold of the Jewish People as it did much of the world. Six million of our people were murdered, homosexuals were executed, the physically handicapped, the Roma, Soviets, Poles and German underground fighters were beaten and slaughtered. Millions were dead. Many unmarked graves, ugly holes in the cold floor of our earth, welcomed these poor spirits.

Humankind was devastated. With the death of so many, our bubble of hope exploded wildly, and oxygen of grief splattered all over the world.

Soon though, it inflated again – our hope bubble did – and humankind uttered, "Never again," allowing for a positive transformation and an invigorated belief in the possibility of civility and peace. Something inside of us understood we had to stymie the activities of the wicked – the Hamans – and we could no longer let murder en masse happen.

Then came Mao Zedong and the 50 million murdered in China. Then came Pol Pot in Cambodia and 1.7 million murdered. Then Menghistu in Ethiopia and a million dead. Then Joseph Savimbi in Angola, Idi Amin in Uganda and Charles Taylor in Liberia. Then the Balkans. Then Rwanda. Then the Iran/Iraq war. Then the Congo. Then Darfur.

Burst!

Darfur. Fracture, rupture… bust!

Explode.

Never again – words.

With all the activism, monies and helicopters committed to the well-being of Darfur's men, women and children, Esther never made it into Achashverosh's court. Darfur is lost. "Never again" is in shambles. What happened?

Jan Pronk, the former head of the United Nations mission in Sudan, said the country had realized it could "get away with anything." That's what happened.

Sudan, like Al Capone in the roaring '20s, and like Iran today, knew it could do what it wanted, when it wanted. Omar al-Bashir of Sudan laughed at petitions, UN resolutions and words like "unacceptable," "genocide," "must stop" – just like Pol Pot of Cambodia who couldn't care about protesters. We, the people, were letting them feast on blood, and they ate heartily.

Refill that balloon.

The only way to stop the next genocide – and there will be another – is for all good people and all "good governments" to fight the enemy hand-to-hand, eye-to-eye, brain-to-brain, and not simply rely on embassy marches.

Like Mordechai and Esther, we need to grab Haman, tie him down forever – and always and recognize evil where it stands and courageously counter it.

How tragic that a balloon can burst twice. Yet with all this bursting, we'll blow it up again – because humankind craves hope.

Live & Learn

All I really need to know I learned in Grade 6

Living & Learning

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When I was talking to educators about the teachers who had a lasting impact on them – for an article that appears elsewhere in this supplement – I noticed some common threads.

The teachers who had a positive impact cared about their students and made learning fun. At the same time, they could be exacting, and knew how to motivate students to achieve. Their students, now working in the field of education themselves, remember them fondly. Not surprisingly, their teachers' influence played a role in their own career choices.

I couldn't help thinking of one of my own teachers – Carolea Macdonald (now Butters) – who taught my Grade 6 class at Wilmington Avenue Public School in 1966-67.

Mrs. Macdonald, who impressed us with her openness and vivacious manner – and her coloured bangles that matched her fashionable outfits – gave us more freedom and responsibility than we'd experienced before, having us sit and work in groups and telling us we didn't need to ask permission to leave the room, as long as we weren't disruptive.

I often think back to a lesson I learned in her class that has become more relevant to me as an adult. Incorporating organizational skills into an assigned project, Mrs. Macdonald had us embark on our research by making two lists: "What I know" and "What I want to find out."

I didn't bother, thinking I could make a go of the project without doing the extra work.

Only later did I realize that Mrs. Macdonald expected us to hand in our "What I know" lists as part of the assignment. I put one together after I finished the project, and she singled it out as a good example, posting it for other students to see.

But it wasn't until last summer, when I was in touch with her about a class reunion, that I confessed in an e-mail.

Editorial

Today, working as a reporter, I find that Grade 6 project often comes to to mind when I'm preparing for an interview or when kids ask me about my work.

In some ways, every article I write is like that project. I take stock of what I know, determine what I want to find out, and put the information together in a way that I hope will be interesting and informative.

Editing a supplement like Live & Learn is a more multi-faceted project.

This one includes an article on the use of exercise balls in the classroom for kids with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder and another about a program that brings together Jewish students with their counterparts of other faiths. We also take a fresh look at Jewish supplementary schools, a subject of increasing relevance, given the high cost of day school tuition.

Jewish kids meet students of other faiths

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Examining the contents of a schoolkid's backpack seems like an odd way of breaking the ice, but for 17 students at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School meeting their counterparts at a Scarborough Muslim school, that's just what happened.

During a visit to the Islamic Foundation School recently, a facilitator from the Canadian Centre for Diversity (CCD) kicked off a joint program with a low-pressure, fun-filled exercise.

Prior to the start of the program, the kids from Paul Penna were nervous – but happy – about the impending experience, said Seth Goldsweig, a teacher at the school. "They were meeting new kids. Some had never met Muslims before."

But, there was also "an excitement to get out of our school and get to meet new kids."

The Paul Penna kids, drawn from the school's grades 7 and 8 classes, mingled with 23 Grade 8 Muslim students, observed a prayer service, toured their facility, heard an imam explain the basics of the Islamic faith and enjoyed a kosher meal.

"At times, kids mingled. At times, people went back to their own groups where they felt comfortable," said Goldsweig.

In the end, Goldsweig termed the event a success on a number of fronts. Many left with promises to continue their contacts on Facebook and with the knowledge that the Muslim students would pay them a return visit a month later.

The bridge-building program is held under the auspices of the Canadian Centre for Diversity (CCD), which has extensive experience knocking down barriers between children of different faith groups and getting them to see beyond stereotypes and labels, said Judy Csillag, director of community outreach for the centre, and Carla Wittes, vice-president of programs.

The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Richmond Hill campus (CHAR), have participated in past years, as has United Synagogue Day School (USDS), Paul Penna and the Bnei Akiva schools. Also taking part in the programs are the Islamic Foundation School, which educates children from kindergarten to Grade 12, and St. Michael's College School, a Roman Catholic institution in midtown.

CCD's first event, in 2002, was to simply bring children to the place of worship of another faith group. USDS was one of the first to come on board, sending a group of grade 7 and 8 students to visit a mosque, a church and a Hindu temple, said Csillag.

Other programs followed, including a "discover diversity" day. It is the CCD's largest program and is so successful, it has been taken up by other schools in the GTA, Winnipeg, Calgary, Vancouver and Halifax.

The CCD also offers a "Quest" and a "Young Leaders" forum. The forum explores the theme "A World Without Stigma" in which senior high school students discuss complex social issues.

Jewish kids from CHAT have participated in the Quest program, a series of in-depth, interactive workshops, interacting with contemporaries from Muslim and Roman Catholic schools, said Wittes.

About 10 Grade 11 students from each school take part in five or six events throughout the school year, and, at the end of classes, nominate Grade 10s to take their place in the coming year.

Typically, the program starts with a lengthy first session and is followed by three events – one in each school – followed by a concluding session. CCD facilitators are involved in the first and last event, but the middle sessions are run largely by the students, Wittes said. Usually they talk about the holidays and traditions of their faith.

Do their discussions ever broach sensitive topics, such as the Israel/Arab conflict, suicide bombings and religious supremacism?

Rules include mutual respect

"The only thing they're limited by are the ground rules," said Wittes. "Mutual respect, listening, confidentiality and to speak only for themselves. Anything can be asked, but ask it respectfully and listen to the answer with respect."

CHAT, CHAR and Bnei Akiva have all participated in the Young Leaders Forum, said Csillag. The event is generally held twice a year, in November and April. Students discuss gender issues, disabilities and discrimination.

One case study, usually addressed in smaller groups, looks at the reaction of a Jewish student who finds swastika graffiti at his school. Jewish, Roman Catholic, Muslim and Hindu students discuss how they'd react to such an event, Wittes said.

Rabbi Scot Berman, headmaster at Yeshiva Bnei Akiva, which includes boys and girls' high schools, said six students from each school attended a CCD program last fall.

"I made the decision [to participate] feeling this is an important experience for our students, to be exposed to a broad cross-section of society," he said.

"Not only to gain but to contribute," he continued, "through our presence and role-modelling that Orthodox Jews are intelligent, contributory to society no less than the rest of typical Canadian society."

CHAT has participated in two CCD programs, said Margaret Klompas, head of guidance at the north Toronto high school. CHAT students have interacted with pupils from St. Mike's and the Islamic Foundation School in the Quest program.

Although CHAT students don't enter the places of worship of other faith groups, they hear presentations about others' religions. Last month, CHAT hosted 30 kids from Catholic and Muslim schools.

Outside the confines of CCD programming, CHAT goes a little further in introducing the beliefs of other faith groups to students.

Samuel Kapustin, director of Jewish studies at CHAT, said the topic comes up during Jewish history classes in the context of Jews' interaction with other religions. It's also tackled in philosophy and ethics classes.

"We try to be objective," he said. "If there are points of conflict, we accept that."

'This is not your father's Hebrew school'

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Temple Emanu-El's Centre for Jewish Living and Learning doesn't put much emphasis on desks and chalkboards.

Students won't take notes for three hours at a time, but they may play with Lego, cook or listen to music during their lessons.

"We're finding that supplementary education is a venue of choice for families who want their [kids] to be educated, not a refuge from day school," said Dan Mendelsohn Aviv, the centre's director. "What we try to do here is provide flexibility, creativity and novelty in their program."

At Temple Emanu-El, a Reform congregation, students are organized in learning communities in which they can choose what they want to study, from the history of Reform Judaism to the revolution in Jewish worship.

This, according to Mendelsohn Aviv, is the future of supplementary schools.

"There are some axioms – what goes up must come down and that Hebrew schools generally suck," he said. "Parents and grandparents will tell you the same thing… a parent will turn to their kids and say, 'I went to Hebrew school and I was miserable, and now you're going to go.'"

But this is changing, and Temple Emanu-El, which opened its Living and Learning Centre three years ago, is proof. The centre, which has about 125 students, holds classes on Sundays and Tuesdays, as well as experiential programs on Shabbat afternoons.

"Our attendance has been the best we've ever seen. Some programs we offer have 99 to 100 per cent attendance," Mendelsohn Aviv said. "The stuff that's going on here is engaging."

By allowing kids to choose what they're learning, Mendelsohn hopes to change how students see Hebrew school.

"If you get to pick what you're learning, it'll avoid the Sunday morning fight in the driveway," he said.

Karen Goodis, principal of Beth Sholom Hebrew School, sees supplementary schools as the glue that connects Jewish kids to their community.

"It gives them… a sense of belonging to something else," she said. "There is always going to be a need for supplementary schools. Everybody's not going to choose day schools."

Goodis thinks this has to do with more than just day school fees.

"Even if [day schools] were free, there are still people who want their children in a public system rather than Jewish day schools," she said.

She agrees that supplementary schools are changing. "The role hasn't changed. The approaches are more creative. I keep saying to my parents [at Beth Sholom], 'This is not your father's Hebrew school.'"

Beth Sholom, a Conservative congregation affiliated with the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues, provides two days of schooling and has about 100 students enrolled.

"The goal is still… to give kids a positive Jewish experience and connection to the synagogue community, as well as to each other. The programs are more active. It's not all sitting at a desk and reading Hebrew."

It's something that Laura Wiseman, director of York University's Jewish teacher education program, has noticed.

"I think that the supplementary schools, over a period of years, have realized the difficulty of educating students who are coming from a full day of other schooling," she said. "They are moving away from entirely formal education… they're integrating much more experiential education and informal programming and that's a… very positive measure on their part."

Wiseman has also seen the role of parents change.

"I think [supplementary schools] really have begun to see… their role as educating families," she said. "Over a period of the last 30-plus years, there's been much more realization that the voice that speaks the loudest is in the home."

It's something most schools have incorporated.

Beth Sholom's Hebrew school involves family education programming, in which parents learn with their children, as does Beit Rayim Synagogue and School, which is affiliated with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ).

"We're trying to integrate the parent as being both the teacher and the learner," said Rabbi David Eligberg, principal of Beit Rayim's supplementary school, which holds day-long sessions once or twice a year in which parents learn with their children.

"They help their children unlock the lessons for that day. That's a model that I see expanding as time goes by."

Another change supplementary schools have been forced to accept is a decrease in hours. About 50 years ago, students went to school five days a week. Around 10 years ago, this changed to three days a week. Now, it's more common to go two days a week for five to six hours in total.

At Beit Rayim, students in grades 2 to 7 attend Hebrew school two days a week for a total of five hours.

"There was a tremendous amount of pressure to reduce the number of days," Rabbi Eligberg said, perhaps because parents began to see the importance of extracurricular activities.

With the loss of a day, teaching Hebrew language skills has become a challenge, Goodis said.

"We need to be very efficient. We need to have very clear expectations about what [students] are going to learn and we need to make every session count," she said. "You cannot teach as much… We're teaching another language. There needs to be adequate time to teach kids how to read."

For Rabbi Eligberg, use of the Internet and computers has been an important change.

"We are already using computer-related learning for Hebrew language. That's enabling students to work a little more independently in a medium that they're familiar with," he said. "[Technology] will be a tremendously important piece of how Jewish education will move forward."

Rabbi Eligberg envisions a time when students will learn both at school and from home.

"I'm not sure when exactly we may get to a point where students will spend a certain amount of time in class and will log in to a group from home," he said, adding that this change is inevitable.

Temple Emanu-El already integrates blogs and the Internet.

"Kids will sit on their computer for days if you let them," Mendelsohn Aviv said. "The idea is to create content and encourage them to create content that will be meaningful."

Students and teachers at Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School paid $2 each for the privilege of wearing a hat in class. The day was part of a yearlong project to raise funds for Schneider Children's Medical Center of Israel.

Students bounce to success at Temple Sinai

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

The students at Temple Sinai's supplementary school don't use exercise balls to stay active. They use them to learn.

Ira Schweitzer, the temple's director of education, has been using exercise balls to help children with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD) concentrate while in class.

Unlike children with attention deficit disorder (ADD), who have trouble concentrating on their work, students with ADHD have trouble keeping still in class. The exercise balls allow these students to move around while staying seated.

Schweitzer, who completed a course with Jensen Learning, an American organization that focuses on conditions such as ADHD, discovered this technique seven or eight years ago.

"I got interested in starting to study about different ways that kids learn," he said. "It just spoke to me. I said, 'You know what... just because our faculties of education did something in the 1970s, we haven't modernized enough.'"

Through his research, Schweitzer found that exercise balls are helpful for kinesthetic learners, students who learn through actions and movement rather than words.

"Kids who learn best through movement and action, since they can't focus, often they just find themselves doing other things and letting their brains wander," Schweitzer said.

"My little bit of research shows [this initiative] has worked. It doesn't mean an hour... they will sit for 15 or 20 minutes and not need to wander and not need to bounce around. They will spend more time focusing on the task."

Through his research, Schweitzer discovered the concept of brain buttons. Some experts believe that the bottom of the spine is an area that, when stimulated, can send more blood up to the brain, therefore causing alertness and better concentration.

"It's a constant massage. It sends more of an awakening to the brain. If kids who had ADHD had a chance to move while studying, rather than sitting on permanent chairs, it would use some of that excess energy," he said.

This is something that Eric Jensen, the founder of Jensen Learning, has studied. While he doesn't discuss brain buttons, Jensen agrees that the simple act of movement can help children with sensory issues, like those with ADHD.

"Some kids who seem to have sensory issues, as in they are way more active, if they sit on [an exercise ball]... instead of a chair... it's a huge benefit," Jensen said. "What it does is it feeds their brain's craving for stimulation without it being disruptive... They get to have a little bit of movement, it keeps them happy."

But this technique only works for a specific demographic, Jensen said.

"Kids who have only ADD without hyperactivity would not find this helpful at all," he said, adding that this technique wouldn't work well for autistic children either, since they would feel out of control on the ball.

According to Jensen, children with ADD and ADHD share three qualities. They have short-term memory issues, are impulsive and have problems concentrating.

Exercise balls help students focus on work

Unlike students with ADD, children with ADHD will physically act out these qualities, Jensen said, adding that they'll hit other kids when upset or feel the need to get up and walk around in class.

The idea to use exercise balls in class came from the special education community, Jensen said.

"They have been sort of the group of teachers that have been saying, 'We'll try anything and see if it works.' They found kids really loved [exercise balls]," he said.

Beth Komito-Gottlieb, Temple Sinai's special needs counsellor, has seen positive results in class.

"I have definitely walked into classes where a couple kids are sitting on them. I know those particular students have a hard time focusing on the task. To my observations, I would say it's successful for those kids," she said, adding that the technique works best when kids are studying Hebrew, a subject that requires sitting and learning, rather than hands-on lessons.

"That's where it's been useful in Temple Sinai, in the Hebrew class. To learn the alphabet, they have to pay attention to it," she said.

Azrieli foundation collects survivors' memoirs

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After prominent Canadian developer David Azrieli had his Holocaust memoirs published by Yad Vashem following a trip to Poland in 1990, he had a vision of helping other survivors get their own stories published.

The result was the Azrieli Foundation's Holocaust survivor's memoirs program, which collects and publishes the memoirs.

The Azrieli Foundation, a Canadian philanthropic organization, supports a wide range of initiatives and programs in the fields of education, architecture and design, Jewish community, Holocaust commemoration and education, scientific and medical research, and the arts.

Naomi Azrieli, foundation president, said that following the trip to Poland, it took her father 10 years to write the book. "Not only is it difficult to struggle with memories, my father is not a professional writer. It was a long process.

"When it was finally published, he realized that the vast majority [of survivors] have no publisher, no vehicle to get their works out there."

Before the foundation embarked on the memoirs project, she said, it did extensive research to discover if any organization was already doing this. "We learned that although there is a big demand for the memoirs, there were simply no resources. We also discovered that commercial publishers, as a rule, don't publish this type of book.

"We put out a call for submissions in 2005, by sending letters and e-mails sent to every synagogue and community centre in the country, and within six weeks we had 50 manuscripts.

"We planned the mailing to go out just prior to Rosh Hashanah so rabbis could announce it from the bimah. From that alone we got the 50 manuscripts, which had been written and were sitting around. It was exactly like my father thought. We now have close to 170, and we're looking for more. That's a lot of publishing to do."

The foundation has published two series of books to date, representing 11 memoirs.

The books, she said, are aimed at general reading audiences and are suitable for senior high school students. "We are careful to let the survivor speak for themselves. We don't edit, because we want to respect their voice. It is a first-person account, and it is not sanitized."

Especially for students, she said, first-person accounts can be very powerful. "They've read a lot of dry textbooks, and these stories put a face to what the students are reading.

"In their memoirs, these survivors were the age of the students are now, and I've received letters from students who said 'I felt like I knew them.'"

In Azrieli's introduction to the manuscript by Ann Szedlecki, titled Album of My Life, she said that "there are people you get to know on the pages of a book whom you wish you could meet in person. So it is with Ann Szedlecki."

Szedlecki begins her book, said Azrieli, by calling herself, "the daughter of nobody, someone with a past that has disappeared. And yet, as she draws us into the life she led as a girl and young woman during World War II, she brings this past to life."

In the preface to the second series of books, David Azrieli wrote that "in telling these stories, the writers have liberated themselves. For so many years, we did not speak about it, even when we became free people living in a free society. Now, when at last we are writing about what happened to us in this dark period of history, knowing that our stories will be read and live on, it is possible for us to feel truly free."

Naomi Azrieli said that from the moving letters the foundation received from members of other immigrant groups who identified with the stories, "we see that we've found a common ground amongst diverse populations.

"It turns out that we are touching people, and I'm beyond delighted and honoured to be doing this. It is truly meaningful work."

Educators recall influence of their own teachers

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A recent online search for sites that include both the word "teachers" and the phrase "lasting impact" yielded 126,000 results. Below, local educators recall teachers who had an impact on them.

Dorothy Hartman, vice-principal of Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School, remembers Jean Crack, her Grade 12 and 13 English teacher at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute in the 1970s, and her "crazy" ways of helping the students remember grammar:

"To me Mrs. Crack seemed old, but somehow she made learning fun. That's why I studied English in university. The way she explained everything in depth – like Shakespeare – she really made sure everyone understood it. She was so prepared and so passionate. She didn't have favourite students. She was strict but fun... She was very clear, and you really understood the work. I knew she had our best interests at heart."

Seth Goldsweig, middle school co-ordinator and Grade 5 and 7/8 Hebrew and Jewish studies teacher, Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, says he has only positive memories of his Grade 5 teacher in Hinesburg, Vt., a small town outside of Burlington. Michael Bonavita died in the 1990s, about a decade later.

"He had an incredible knack for making learning fun. My mom tells me she never had to ask me what I did in school, because I would always come home and tell her what we had done. Having me work with a friend of mine who was hyper – enlisting my help – I remember a huge sense of accomplishment.

"Two things happened because I was in that class. I was always 'into' school, but it made me more into school. I remember for a long time thinking to myself I wanted to be a teacher – and a Grade 5 teacher – to do my best to reproduce the experience he gave me for my own students. He was a driving force for me to become a teacher."

Gail Baker, principal, Toronto Heschel School, became a history major because of her high school history teacher some four decades ago at A.Y. Jackson Secondary School – Norm Kelly, who went on to become a city councillor.

"We were studying Canadian history in Grade 11 – World War I and World War II – and we had to do projects. He said to me, 'How much Jewish history do you know? I think it would be really important for you to know who you are and understand your background and your place in history.' He started me on an independent project that lasted all year.

"He believed very strongly in me as a person and as a student. He always challenged me. He kept asking me questions.

"He really got us to explore and reach. It was the most difficult class I ever had. He challenged and supported us. It had great impact. Challenge and support were the two things that stayed with me, and I think that has influenced the way I work with my teachers and students.

"Also, I had to do a lot of self-reflection... It really got me to think about my place in history. That was very inspiring for me, and I've never forgotten it."

Shana Harris, head of school, Bialik Hebrew Day School, remembers two educators who had an impact on her – one in the classroom and one in an informal context – in her hometown of Witbank, South Africa.

"I had a high school teacher who influenced my becoming an educator. She was actually a Latin teacher who had a great passion for her subject. She made it really interesting, challenging and engaging, but more than that she connected with us as her students. It was very motivating. She made us feel she cared about us, that she knew us, and wanted us to do our best for ourselves... She pushed us to keep endeavouring to do better. I tried to be the same type of teacher.

"I also had an 'informal teacher' who had an impact. Derek Gavshon [now acting head of school at a Jewish day school in California] was my madrich in Bnei Zion [youth movement] when I was in elementary school in Witbank, a small town. He inspired in me this connection to Israel, Zionism, and pride in being Jewish. I bumped into him at a conference, and it was so wonderful – we hadn't seen each other in 45 years. It was such a pleasure for me to say to him, 'Here I am [working] in a Jewish day school."

Helene Green, principal, William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute, immediately thought of Neil Perkins, her music teacher for five years in the 1960s at Vaughan Road Collegiate, where she played the flute.

"He was a new, young teacher. He was fun, he was cool, and he was teaching me something I really loved. He was funny – he had a very light, quiet humour, but you were always listening to see what he would say.

"He went on to become the co-ordinator of music for the York Board of Education... Music is very important, and I love music. There are studies that show the connections between music and math, very strong connections.

"As an educator, what I learned from him is what I try to inculcate my teachers with – the use of humour, where it fits into the lesson – to engage kids."

Amanda Fingerhut, Grade 9 and 12 math teacher, Earl Haig Secondary School and winner of the 2009 Canadian Living Me to We award for her work with the Herbert H. Carnegie Future Aces Foundation (an organization that works with young people), remembers Isabel Pecorella, her role model as a teacher when she attended Forest Hill Collegiate in the 1990s. Pecorella died a few years after Fingerhut graduated.

"She taught me two subjects over three years. She was an unbelievable teacher and person... Every student knew she cared about each and every student. Everybody did their homework for her, because they thought they would actually hurt her if they didn't. I try to emulate things she did, but I haven't gotten there yet.

"She was fun. She took us to art exhibits. We'd go out to Italian restaurants and have to speak in Italian.

"She made us think we were choosing what we were doing... I'm sure she had that all planned. We just didn't realize it.

"More than that, she made our classes feel like families... She was real with us. We didn't feel there was a wall between us and her.

"She was always smiling. There was always laughter.

"The first day I was in Grade 9 Beginner Italian, she gave us words that she knew everyone would be able to spell – real Italian words that were extremely obvious, so people felt this was a class that they could succeed in. I walked away believing that teaching is about making kids feel good about themselves, and working with kids to make them feel valued and respected."

Deborah Epstein-Franks, middle school co-ordinator and English teacher, Leo Baeck Day School south campus, is back at the school she attended when Ellen Steck taught her Grade 7 English 24 years ago:

"And now I teach Grade 7 English. She was someone who really expected excellence and pushed you to do the best you could. She was super-organized and had a sense of humour. She was strict, but really fair, and I felt like I learned a lot from her.

"There were things she taught me that I still call on today, like ways to spell words. She was a real stickler for grammar. I try to model what I do with my students on her example... We had a ton of assignments, but she taught us really good organizational skills, so it was manageable.

"She exposed us to Latin and Greek roots of words, things that help you later in life... and then she would make it fun. She was big on vocabulary and the more structured aspects of language, and I think up until that point I had struggled with that... I gained the confidence I needed to achieve.

"As a teacher, I'm still a big grammar girl. I do have a structured, traditional grammar program. I'm a big stickler, and even in my spelling program, I purposely find things like Latin and Greek roots in our speller, and I make sure I cover those. I do focus on ones that help you be able to figure out what words mean by looking at the base or the prefix.

"And sometimes it's not concrete things you're left with, but the general feeling of what your teacher does for you. She was there for the love of teaching and making the difference, and you could feel it in everything she did... She left a real mark."

Rabbi Elliott Diamond, vice-principal Judaic studies, Netivot HaTorah Day School, who graduated from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto in 1973, now considers his mentor and teacher, Rabbi Chaim Sacknovitz, a friend.

"I first met Rabbi Sacknovitz as a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and I found him to be genuine, committed and passionate about his Judaism, but as I got to know him as a mentor and a teacher, I found his understanding of Judaism and modern Orthodoxy very engaging, and it spoke very much to me in a personal and religious way.

"I found his attitude compassionate as well as passionate. He was always willing to let his curiosity drive his belief. In other words, questions were OK. I found that to be a very compelling message... an incredibly important way of looking at Judaism. Some people find questions a little frightening and discourage them."

The hardest questions aren't on the exam!

How do I choose a university or college – in Canada or the US? • What does it take to get in? • What programs and career options should I consider? • How do I get back on track if I have had academic difficulties? • How can I improve my chances for admission to a professional school? • Should I consider graduate school? • What if I have no focus yet? • Everyone always told me to keep my options open – so, now what?

Avoiding 'one size fits most'

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

I often ask myself if I would still do things the same way if we had all the money in the world.

Shop at Value Village?

Compost in the backyard?

Rescue discarded kiddie cars at the curb?

Home school?

Since it became apparent last fall that our daughter, who turned five this month, is still hanging around at home with me and her two-year-old brother, people have started asking why we home school. And while the money that we're bound to save often comes up, that's only one answer, and a superficial one at that.

Momentarily insecure, I asked some colleagues – fellow Jewish home schoolers online – what I could say when people ask. It's not as if I hadn't thought about the question for years, but their responses helped coalesce my feelings.

Many of them offered variations on schools not meeting their children's special needs, but that doesn't really apply here. We've never tried sending our daughter to school. She'd probably love it.

Why we home school

Then, there were the snappy one-liners:

• "I wouldn't want her to be bored."

• "I was home schooled for a year – best year I ever had."

• "Why be a stay-home mom if you send your kids away?"

Most resonant, however, was a thoughtful reply from an adoptive mom in the United States: "When I became the parent of these children, I entered into a covenant with them that I would do everything in my power to make sure they were cared for properly and that they never had to doubt that I wanted what was best for them. Dumping them into a public school system which is overburdened, underfunded and overcrowded is not in their best interest."

Couldn't you say the same – at least a little bit – about the overburdened and underfunded Jewish education system here?

It's not that the schools aren't trying. But after 10 years of dealing with day schools, I have seen too many compromises: overcrowded classrooms; run-down or bleak facilities; high-tech gadgetry that schools feel pressured to buy but can't afford to maintain or train teachers to use; school playgrounds with no green space for kids to just run around; too few gym classes in too-cramped spaces; and schedules and curricula that would make most adults' heads spin, offering the best of both worlds, Jewish and secular, while overlooking that most magical world of free-range childhood.

I'll come clean: we have two older children in Jewish schools, and I'm very happy with both schools – at last. I believe most schools work pretty well, especially for average children who don't demand too much.

Yet it's a whispered truth in some circles that parents must often choose between Jewish studies and general studies. I haven't met a day school parent who has bragged that their school has found the perfect balance.

Then, too, you must factor in which schools match your family's outlook, religiously and philosophically, both in terms of Jewish philosophy and educational philosophy. In some cases, too, it's not enough to choose the school. The school must also accept your family. This narrows the field significantly. For most, it usually comes down to one or two choices (if you're lucky).

And then, what are the odds that either of those one or two is that rare school that offers excellence in every single area?

Returning to the original question of why we home school, several parents suggested the generic statement, "It just fits best for our family."

I like it.

The simplicity of it makes me happy, even while some of the truths about mainstream Jewish education sadden me deeply.

Shouldn't we be suspicious of a mindset where parents are encouraged to get their kids out of the house into "preschool" by age three or earlier? Dr. Spock's most quoted advice is "trust yourself" – perhaps too few parents trust themselves to educate their young children.

And why are some of the most sought-after preschool programs held in synagogues? Maybe they could help by offering more programs that encourage parents and their young children to stay together instead. I get tired of being the only parent in a sea of nannies.

Lest you think it's all about duty and textbook education, I must admit, we're mostly in it for the fun, and the freedom to learn wherever and however we happen to be at any given moment. The professionalization of early childhood has undermined parents' confidence to teach their own kids, but no matter what type of schooling we choose, we'll always be their first and most important teachers.

What about socialization? People often ask how home-schooled kids learn to line up, take turns, share nicely, raise hands to answer a question, get along with others and chat with their peers.

Learning happens everywhere

Like so-called stay-at-home moms, home schoolers don't just hang around the house. Unless you shrink-wrap your kids to the sofa, they will spend time with other people. True, they might not all be the same age, as they would be in a classroom setting. But it's possible that an arbitrary classification – to place children in classes by year of birth, from January to December – actually puts many kids at a social disadvantage.

Whether we're in line at the grocery store, pulling a wagon down the street, schlepping to dance or swimming lessons, hanging out at the library or making challah at home, my children are learning. And each moment is an opportunity to watch them, listen to them, share values with them and point out things that are beautiful – or ugly. Learning happens whether they're inside a classroom or not, and when they're home schooled, every moment can be a teachable moment.

If I had all the money in the world, maybe shelling out tens of thousands of dollars for one-size-fits-many Jewish education would sting a little less. Until then, you'll find me skipping the commute and carpools, schooling happily at home with my kids.

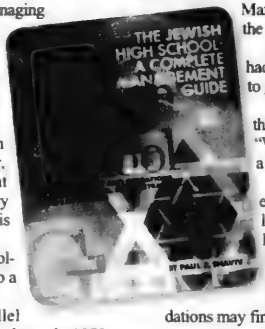
Shaviv writes the book on Jewish high schools

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Paul Shaviv has written the book on managing a Jewish high school. Literally.



His newly published tome – a hefty, 387-page softcover titled The Jewish High School: A Complete Management Guide – is, to the best of Shaviv's knowledge, the only one of its kind.

The material draws on his more than three decades of experience as an educator, and most recently his past dozen years at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, where he is director of education.

Since he arrived in Toronto in 1998, enrolment at the school has doubled from 750 to a total of 1,500 students on two campuses.

Shaviv, 60, began his career as a Hillel director in his native London, England, in the early 1970s, and has served as an administrator at five Jewish schools on three continents. Before moving to Toronto in 1998, he served for four years as principal of Bialik High school in Montreal. Last year, he was one of two recipients for the prestigious Max M. Fisher Prize for Jewish Education in the Diaspora.

In part, Shaviv wrote the book "because I had all of this in my head, and I felt I wanted to get it down."

But he also felt he should share the way things are done at TanenbaumCHAT, he said. "We had, as a team – as a school – developed a high standard of school process."

The book has an inherently limited readership – specifically, administrators and lay leaders of the approximately 300 Jewish high schools in the English-speaking world. As well, students and faculty of Jewish teacher training programs and people affiliated with boards of education and foundations may find it of interest, Shaviv said.

One of the ways in which Jewish schools differ from their non-Jewish private school counterparts – and which is addressed in the book – is the tendency of their boards of directors to be much more involved, said Shaviv. As well, he added, many students are grandchildren and great-grandchildren of Holocaust survivors.

Also, he believes that for many parents, the school has replaced the synagogue as "the major institution of Jewish family commitment." And, he said, "in a Jewish school, you have the whole issue of transmission of values and Judaism."

Shaviv said that The Jewish High School: A Complete Management Guide was "virtually self-published" by the Principal Press via createspace.com, a subsidiary of Amazon, as a "print-on-demand" book.

"It's very environmentally friendly," he said.

Copies are printed and shipped within a day, he noted, and can be ordered online at createspace.com/3413024. The book retails for $55.

Grade 4 student Matthew Gelgoot, at Leo Baeck Day School's south campus, shows off the model he constructed depicting the biblical story of Joseph's brothers throwing him into a pit.

Book gives queer perspective on Torah

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Gregg Drinkwater has a unique interpretation of the Torah.

When reading the weekly passages, he sees the possibility of Adam being created as both male and female. And when hearing about the story of Jacob and Joseph, he can understand why some might call Joseph "the queerest of all Genesis characters."

Drinkwater, the executive director of Jewish Mosaic: the National Center for Sexual and Gender Diversity in Denver, Colo., is one of three editors who put together Torah Queeries: Weekly Commentaries on the Hebrew Bible.

The book is a collection of essays that analyze the Torah through a LGBT (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender) perspective.

And it's also the inspiration for York University assistant professor Aviva Golderg's new four-week course.

The course, which is run through Congregation Shir Libeynu, Kolel, Kulanu Toronto, and the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre was formed after the Canadian book launch of Torah Queeries in November 2009. It ran every Tuesday in February and explores several essays and themes presented in the Torah, such as Leviticus and the story of Jacob and Joseph.

"I think it's revolutionary because there's been nothing of its kind until now," Goldberg said of the course and the book. "It has taken awhile, but the 'gay revolution' in a political sense is also taking place in a theological and religious sense."

Goldberg is the spiritual leader of Congregation Shir Libeynu, an inclusive and unaffiliated congregation in downtown Toronto. She sees the course as a continuation of the Jewish tradition.

"What we're seeing more and more are gay and lesbian rabbis who are bringing both traditional commentary [on the Torah] and expanding it through their own lens," she said. "I think it's part of our tradition, rabbis traditionally have said… it's our responsibility in every generation to examine [the Torah.]"

Sharoni Sibony, the interim managing director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning in Toronto, sees Toronto as a community that has room for improvement.

"It seems that the Toronto community isn't so open LGBT," she said, adding that this isn't necessarily the case in the United States.

"In the States, they have… gay congregations that have over time created a new way of liturgy, a new way of thinking about community," she said.

This is what she hopes will happen with Torah Queeries.

"It may start from queer readings or LGBT perspectives, but it's really asking us to think about… the lessons we can extrapolate from these readings that will make the communities much more inclusive," she said.

For Sibony, the course isn't just about education, it's about dialogue.

"If we can just sort of create a conversation where people actually listen to each other and understand the humanity in everybody and the Jewishness in everybody," she said. "People are always searching for that sense of belonging."

Sibony learned this at Kulanu Toronto dinner, Toronto's only Jewish LBGT social and education group, where she spoke to a girl who "said the Pride parade was the only day of the year when she wasn't embarrassed about being gay. That's just startling to me," Sibony added.

Torah Queeries initially started as a web project called Jewish Mosaic: Torah Queeries, Drinkwater said. The website features LGBT perspectives on Torah passages.

Eventually Drinkwater, along with Joshua Lesser and David Shneer, turned the website into a book.

"I think it serves two purposes. One is to bring more LGBT Jews to the text or to deepen their connection to the text," he said. "They're not really engaging with the Torah right now at all. It's one of my missions to change that," Drinkwater said.

The book's other purpose is to provide different perspectives to heterosexual Jews, Drinkwater, who is part of the LGBT community, said.

"The opportunity to work with LGBT people opens up a whole new realm of the Torah," he said.

From left, Daniel Tyberg, Matthew Cohen, Noah Ross and Aubrey Maltz (sitting), Grade 7 students at United Synagogue Day School's Bathurst campus, determined in a study of Cain and Abel how different disciplines contribute to the judicial system in deciding an appropriate punishment for crimes.

Schools face issue of sexual abuse

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In the past six months, two Jewish high schools in Toronto have been forced to confront a difficult truth.

In September, Avichai Zehavi, a former shaliach at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, was arrested in Israel for alleged sexual abuse of a 14-year-old male student at a religious boys' high school there.

Just three months later, Jaskaransingh (Jask) Ramburn, a French teacher at Toronto's Bnei Akiva Schools, was charged with sexually assaulting a girl who was not a student at the school. Ramburn has been suspended, pending court proceedings.

Both were popular teachers, and Zehavi received a Teacher of Excellence award in 2002, a privately sponsored (and now defunct) award that used to be given to teachers in the Jewish day school system.

Paul Shaviv, TanenbaumCHAT's director of education, addressed the issue at a Jewish day school conference last month in New Jersey, in a talk entitled "Dealing with sexual predators – from a school management perspective."

Shaviv – who also wrote about the subject in his recently published book, The Jewish High School: A Complete Management Guide – told The CJN, "It's very clear nowadays – and it's a very good thing – that there's far greater awareness and far less tolerance, meaning zero tolerance, of improper exercise of authority and influence of teachers over students."

He believes it's incumbent on principals and school administrators to be aware of the issue of sexual abuse, try to prevent it, and deal with it when issues and allegations arise.

However, he said, "I don't think you can ever prevent it entirely, because human nature is what it is, and I think, as in every profession, there are aspects of the context of teaching that sometimes attract people with a darker side to their personalities."

Principals have to be prepared to "ask questions and to be suspicious in a discreet manner," he said. "I think that a good principal develops a sixth sense for noticing the tiny things that are out of order… and questions [as one example] why a particular door is open or closed when it shouldn't be."

If there is even a suspicion of an improper relationship, principals must be "absolutely insistent – and I would say even ruthless – about following correct procedure and ensuring that their students are not in any danger whatsoever."

"As soon as there is a suspicion that a child is, or has been, at risk or has been a victim of abuse, there is a legal duty to notify a recognized child protection agency," Shaviv said.

One issue that is specific to Jewish schools is that it isn't uncommon for students to be invited to teachers' homes for Shabbat dinner, as was the case with Zehavi, who, with his wife and young children, hosted up to half a dozen students at a time at his house on Friday nights.

Shaviv said that such evenings are part of "the experiential side of the Jewish programming" that students receive at school, and, as such, is "extremely important.

"Everyone understands that a very beautiful part of Jewish life is the home life," he said.

Shaviv suggested a few guidelines for such situations:

- Whatever the setting is, interactions between teachers and students always have to retain the awareness that this is an educational relationship and not a personal one.
- There should be a minimum number of students.
- There must always be a husband and wife hosting together.

As well, he strongly favours the creation of a "school ethos" so that students, teachers and parents know what is acceptable and what isn't.

"Ethos is one of the most precious assets a school can have," said Shaviv.

He said that schools "should make it easy and user-friendly to voice complaints or concerns about any person associated with the school in regard to improper behaviour of any sort."

Rabbi Scot Berman, headmaster of Bnei Akiva Schools – which has separate high schools for boys and girls, Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot – told The CJN that schools must ensure "that the settings in which students and adults interact are open environments, and that there aren't areas in which students and teachers meet which are closed off, [such as] a room that doesn't have a window.

"It's very important to have those kinds of transparencies to protect all the people involved," he said.

Although such precautions – and background checks undertaken before staff members are hired – can reduce the odds of inappropriate behaviour taking place, Rabbi Berman said he doesn't think there is any "foolproof system."

In 2001, he was principal of a school in New Jersey when a teacher was arrested for molesting one of his students, a "much more complicated and tumultuous" experience than what happened at Bnei Akiva, where there were "no known situations between Mr. Ramburn and the students."

In the immediate aftermath of hearing the news, the Bnei Akiva schools' social worker "was able to touch base with all the students" to determine and address their needs, Rabbi Berman said.

"I think we were successful in creating an environment that was safe for students to come forward," he added.

In Shaviv's book, written before allegations surfaced against his school's former shaliach, he wrote, "It is sobering to understand how charm, charisma and talent can mask an altogether more sinister agenda."

But for every charismatic teacher who is a sex offender, there are probably "99, maybe more, who are just plain charismatic teachers," Rabbi Berman said.

"The charismatic piece by itself is not an indicator that the person is problematic," he said. "Every administrator would like every one of his teachers to be popular and charismatic, and capable of having the kind of magnetism to inspire students to learn and grow and develop."

A much more likely red flag would be "one-on-one private meetings between teachers and students."

But, said Rabbi Berman, "hopefully the protocols are clear that within a school that's not acceptable, and once that is discovered, steps can be taken to eliminate it, and to investigate if anything unhealthy has transpired."

Lessons from pursuing an MBA in Israel

By JORDAN SCHAFFRAN
Special to The CJN

When deciding to do an MBA, I went through a process to select the school that would best fit both my needs and talents.

The benefits and advantages that you derive from an MBA program can be immeasurable in terms of preparing yourself to meet the challenges of today's evolving world. After spending several years working at investment firms in downtown Toronto, I decided to embark on my MBA to help catapult my career.

I knew it would be challenging to select the institution that would offer the best opportunities, as the options available were quite broad in range.

I came to the decision that completing my degree at Tel Aviv University's Sofaer International MBA (IMBA) program would be the optimal choice for me after speaking with academic director Prof. Simon Benninga.

He viewed the experiences I would gain from studying in Israel and immersing myself in Israeli culture as unsurpassable. Considering the business professionals I would be introduced to throughout Israel and abroad made it a simpler decision when settling on where to complete my post-graduate degree.

Embarking on my degree in Israel and being a part of the inaugural Sofaer IMBA class was one of the motivating factors that helped the program stand at the forefront of my decision.

Since October, when I began my studies, I have gained a tremendous amount of experience and knowledge from the courses I have taken and the professionals I have been exposed to. I am one of 55 students in my MBA class. My fellow students have diverse backgrounds, coming from places around the world that include Costa Rica, South Africa and India.

Together, we have tackled subjects such as financial accounting, leading a responsible public company, and marketing management.

The Sofaer IMBA program is helping me move toward a more focused direction as I select my goal path. Having conversed with the program staff on an ongoing basis, I have been making the necessary contacts in the Israeli business community to position myself to receive job opportunities post-graduation.

Tel Aviv University's Business School hosts business leaders throughout Israel and the business world on an ongoing basis. Being able to attend conferences and presentations dealing with issues such as the Chinese economy or the future of the electric car (which Israel has taken the lead on), I have networked with the Israel business community in hopes of assuring job prospects post-graduation.

The most compelling aspect thus far in being able to earn my MBA at Tel Aviv University and live in Israel has been the experiences, whether it be hearing such speakers as Stanley Fischer, the governor of the Bank of Israel, meeting with doctors and patients from Save a Child's Heart Foundation, or having lunch with Jon Allen, the Canadian ambassador to Israel.

What I have gained from being part of the Tel Aviv University atmosphere is immeasurable. I have visited Israel on many occasions and lived on a kibbutz for half a year, learning Hebrew, but never truly have been able to immerse myself into the Israeli culture as I have now.

From being introduced to fellow students at the university who study for their MBA in Hebrew to meeting professionals in the Israeli business community, I really have felt part of Israeli culture in ways I have not experienced before.

The most amazing thing about studying for an MBA abroad in Israel is seeing and hearing first-hand the innovation that is so often talked about in this country.

The innovation and entrepreneurship that Israel is known for was one of my motivating factors in coming to study my MBA in Israel. The lessons I have been able to gain from the business community in Israel, because of its drive for success and entrepreneurship, have taught me invaluable lessons that I hope to build on.

Genocide in a Multiethnic Town: Event, Origins, Aftermath

Professor Omer Bartov
John P. Birkelund Distinguished Professor of European History, Brown University

This lecture traces the complex relations among Poles, Jews and Ukrainians in the Galician town of Buczacz; their impact on the events of 1941 to 1944, when murder of Jews and ethnic cleansing of Poles took place during the German occupation and in its wake; and how these events have been remembered and commemorated in the postwar period.

Mackenzie student creates change at Copenhagen and beyond

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

Many Grade 11 students wouldn't be able to find Copenhagen on a map: Zack Bernholtz went there and back in December to bring his passionate environmental message to the 15th annual United Nations Climate Change Conference (COP15).

For Bernholtz, climate change is not an abstract topic – it's a problem for us all, one he is working hard to solve.

Joining a delegation of 11 students from the University of Waterloo, the William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute student was among 200 Canadian youths participating in the summit, which took place from Dec. 7 to 18, although technically, he pointed out, youth is defined as "ages 18 to 30." At 16, he is too young to be considered a youth activist.

Zack Bernholtz, left, participates in a candlelight vigil in Copenhagen following a march for climate justice on Dec. 12.

That didn't stop Bernholtz, who's been involved with his school's extracurricular SWITCH (Solar and Wind Initiatives Towards Change) organization since he started there three years ago. With the help of influential friends that include David Suzuki, SWITCH has raised enough money to install 52 solar panels on Mackenzie's roof. The array began operating last fall, making the school one of the province's most eco-friendly.

With Bernholtz now on its executive, SWITCH is currently looking outward, aiming to roll out $200 million worth of solar panels across 2,000 Ontario schools.

Bernholtz's growth in environmentalism has been slow and steady, with lots of meticulous research. Far from drudgery, he said the process has been a pleasure. "When you find something you can connect with, you enjoy doing it. That's how I feel about studying the environment, learning… and creating change."

Creating change was what Bernholtz hoped for on his way to Copenhagen in December. "We were hoping for the developed governments of the world to realize that action is needed now… you can't wait another year until [COP16 in] Mexico …or two years and [COP17 in] South Africa. You need something that is legally binding now."

The summit was "completely hectic," said Bernholtz, who recalls arriving at Copenhagen's Bella Center swept up in a chaotic jumble of 45,000 representatives of governments and NGOs around the world, three times the anticipated number. The 1,500 youth participants, including Bernholtz, were divided into working groups to address various climate-related issues.

Bernholtz worked with members from a wide range of backgrounds within the adaptation working group, one whose message, he said, is especially urgent given our current unsustainable lifestyle: "People are going to have to change and adapt." That working group produced a document and also brought a 90-second speech summarizing its conclusions before the United Nations.

He also participated in protests, including Dec. 12 global march for climate justice, which brought 100,000 participants along a chilly route from downtown Copenhagen to the Bella Center.

He credits his parents' "great sense of community involvement" – his family founded and runs Chicago 58 Food Products – with inspiring him to get involved far beyond most typical high school students, and empowering him in "learning things for myself and researching them for myself and developing my own ideas."

Bernholtz returned home in December frustrated with the outcome of the summit – the Copenhagen Accord. "It proved the futility of a large government meeting where 192 countries try to decide upon something that is incredibly complex," he said.

"We wanted a fair, ambitious and binding climate treaty." Because the accord isn't legally binding, Bernholtz believes, it is essentially meaningless. "It is a complete waste of time," he said, a sentiment echoed on the world stage by representatives of many nations and the European Union, which has dubbed the accord a "disaster" and the summit itself a "great failure."

Far from giving up, Bernholtz has moved on to other environmental activities, including a global youth campaign to address world leaders, including Canada's prime minister, with a very personal message: "Can you, Stephen Harper, look into your children's eyes and tell them that their future will be different from today?… that hundreds of millions of people's lives will be in jeopardy because of your actions?"

Bernholtz said our country must take more of an active role, and that our current complacency is shameful. "Canada is currently seen by the rest of the world as one of the few nations that is stopping progress."

Driven by the science behind climate change, he believes the naysayers have no solid ground to stand on. "Animal species are being wiped out at a rate that is 1,000 times the natural rate… essentially the biggest extinction since the dinosaurs." This is basically our fault – and therefore, our responsibility, Bernholtz believes. "The last time that there was a warming this great was 126,000 years ago."

Though he described himself as a "glass half-empty" person, he's definitely hopeful that the world will come into line as scientists accumulate data over the long term, and "as emerging powers come to the global stage."

Without pinning down a specific career path, Bernholtz plans to continue his environmental research and activities beyond high school, including perhaps the Climate Change Conference in South Africa in 2011. Until then, he'll be raising money, putting up solar panels, speaking to other kids… and hopefully spreading his enthusiasm to a new generation of environmentalists.

The Jewish Connection

Through his involvement with NCSY (formerly National Conference of Synagogue Youth), Zack Bernholtz has come to believe that preserving the environment is more than a global value – it's a Jewish value. Before he went to Copenhagen in December, he and friend David Kadish wrote: "As Jewish Canadians, it's our responsibility to try and push our country into action and back to the front of the pack as a global leader. Of the many laws and customs that deal with treatment of the land, bal tashchit stands out in instructing against squandering precious natural wealth. The commandment to not destroy fruit-bearing trees from Deuteronomy has been interpreted by rabbinical sources as an obligation to not use more than we need.

"The predicted effects of a changing climate provide further imperative for Jewish action. Models show that some of those most heavily affected will be the world's least wealthy populations that, for the most part, have had little hand in causing the changes that they will experience. Judaism takes great lengths to ensure that the less fortunate are cared for, from traditions of giving tzedakah to laws about leaving the corners of your field for the hungry to harvest.

"We must help ensure that the corners of our global field are still available for those in need."

Program provides real life experience

Jordan Schaffran plays with a young patient connected with the Save a Child's Heart program.

To hear the achievements of the many small startup companies in this country is such a motivating factor for me, to want to be a part of Israel's numerous accomplishments in the future.

In choosing Tel Aviv University's Sofaer IMBA program, I chose a program in which I can get real-life experience that will help me regardless of what career direction I pursue on graduation.

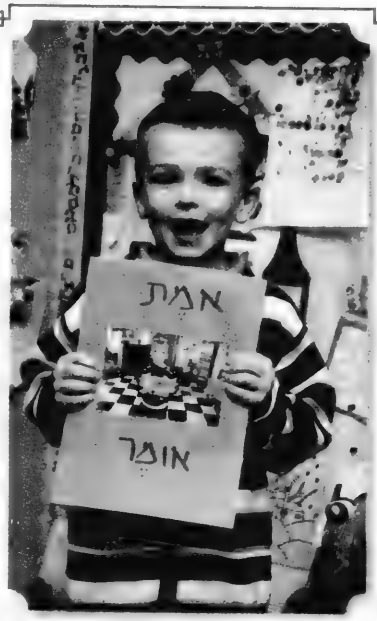
Being able to live in Tel Aviv and study at the university has truly been a dream come true for me. I have absorbed myself into the Tel Aviv culture to get a full sense of what it is like to live in Israel. The experiences I have garnered thus far from living in Israel will last me a lifetime.

I have new friendships that will carry way beyond the classroom once the school year ends. The professors who have taught me thus far have been extraordinary in helping me understand topics more clearly, to help prepare me for the business world.

I can only hope the rest of the remaining two semesters will be as rewarding as the first one in terms of the amount of knowledge and hands-on experience I have gained so far.

Our upcoming class trip to China in June to learn about the local economy and meet with business professionals should be a highlight.

I look forward to expanding on the knowledge and experience I gathered from being part of the Sofaer IMBA program. I know that upon graduation I will be able to immerse myself into any position with ease. I only hope that, in the end, I am able to give back to Israel a fraction (or hopefully all) of what it has been able to give me.



At Gan Netivot HaTorah south, Emet enjoys presenting his project in Hebrew as part of the Chalav u'Davash program.

Still fighting for his son

Noam Schalit carries the plea for his son's release to the people of Gaza. Schalit's son, Gilad, has been held captive in Gaza for more than three years. He stuck a message to his son's captors on relief goods en route to the Gaza Strip at the Kerem Shalom crossing. The message reminds Gaza's leaders that Schalit's release is a precondition for the improvement of the economic situation in Hamas-ruled Gaza. [Flash90 photo]

Congratulations to our Olympians

What a wonderful finish to the wonderful Winter Olympic Games in Vancouver. Our athletes pushed higher, farther and faster than ever before. Under conditions of unrelenting pressure, they pulled from the deepest reservoirs of strength, courage and determination. Ever Canadian, they did so with humility, grace and fun. That they also won more Winter Games gold medals than any other country had ever won and finished third among medal totals was a bonus. Congratulations and thank you. Our hearts glowed with pride.

It's not the Olympics but... Israeli peewees win in Quebec City

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An Israeli team making its North American debut became the upset champion in its division at an international peewee hockey tournament near Quebec City.

Bat Yam surprised even their most ardent supporters by winning the gold medal in Division B of the 35th annual BSR International Peewee Hockey Tournament held in suburban Lévis. They won all four of their games in the division, which had 17 teams, mostly from Quebec.

The BSR is the little cousin of the Quebec International Peewee Hockey Tournament, now in its 51st year, which took place concurrently and includes 16 countries and over 2,000 players

In the final game Feb. 21, Bat Yam beat Edmundston, N.B., 8-7. Earlier that day, the Israelis, ages 9-12, won the semifinal game against the Brûleurs de Loups 1 from Grenoble, France, 3-2 in overtime.

Bat Yam, which is near Tel Aviv, stunned everyone with their 8-2 trouncing of the Husky 1 Chaudière-Ouest in their opener at the 10-day tournament, before going on to edge another Quebec team, the Aigles CBIO of Beauport, 3-2.

"It's unbelievable," said Jonathan Hawey, the Jewish Quebec City resident who was largely responsible for convincing the organizers to include Israel for the first time in the tournament, which drew about 130 teams from seven other countries.

The News in Brief

Canada

Rabbi Gets City Key

OTTAWA — Former Canadian Jewish Congress President Rabbi Reuven Bulka has been given a key to the city by Ottawa Mayor Larry O'Brien. The mayor made the Feb. 18 presentation during Kindness Week, which Rabbi Bulka helped establish to promote positive feelings in the city. Rabbi Bulka has been spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas since 1967 and has written more than 30 books. He also hosts a Sunday-night talk show on CFRA Radio in Ottawa.

Nobel Nod For Matas

OTTAWA — MP Boris Wrzesnewskyj has nominated Winnipeg human rights lawyer David Matas and former Liberal MP David Kilgour for the Nobel Peace Prize for their work related to investigating organ harvesting crimes against Falun Gong practitioners in China. In his nomination to the Nobel committee, Wrzesnewskyj said awarding the prize to Matas and Kilgour "would help the world realize that liberty, human rights, and the rule of law can be won by determined peaceful acts of conscience."

World

Corries Sue Israel

JERUSALEM — The family of Rachel Corrie, a U.S. activist killed in 2003 by an Israeli army bulldozer in Gaza, is suing Israel. The case is to be heard in Haifa on March 10. Four witnesses who were with Corrie when she died will testify, the Guardian reported. Corrie, 23, of Olympia, Wash., was trying to stop a bulldozer from demolishing a Palestinian home when she was killed. An Israeli army probe found the driver couldn't see her and killed her unintentionally. The report accused Corrie of "illegal, irresponsible and dangerous" behaviour. Witnesses say she was visible to the driver and that activists shouted at him to stop before he hit her.

Man Avoids Ouster

PERTH, Australia — An alleged Nazi war criminal living in Australia has appealed to the Human Rights Commission in a bid to avoid extradition to his native Hungary. Charles Zentai's lawyer asked the commission to intervene on the grounds there was no guarantee Hungary can ensure a fair trial, especially in the absence of witnesses. Zentai, 88, of Perth, is facing allegations in Hungary that he helped murder Jewish teenager Peter Balasz in Budapest in November 1944. Zentai has denied the claim since he was first arrested by Australian police in 2005. The Human Rights Commission can't supersede the legal processes of his extradition but could help pay for his legal fight against extradition. His appeal is scheduled to begin March 31.

Mezuzah Hung

DOVER, Delaware — Jack Markel, Delaware's first Jewish governor, hung a mezuzah Feb. 23 at the governor's mansion in the capital, Dover. The mezuzah was given to him as an inauguration gift.

Star Trek Actor's Son Found Dead

Andrew Koenig

VANCOUVER — The depressed son of the Jewish actor who played Chekhov on the 1960s Star Trek TV series was found dead in Vancouver's Stanley Park last week of an apparent suicide.

Walter Koenig and his wife, Judy Levitt Koenig, had come to Vancouver to find their son, actor Andrew Koenig, 41, – who was best known for playing the character Richard (Boner) Stabone on the 1980s TV series Growing Pains. He was last seen in the city near Stanley Park on Feb. 14 and missed his Feb. 16 flight home.

He suffered from depression and had stopped taking his medication. He had also given away his possessions and gave notice to his landlord before heading to visit friends in Toronto and Vancouver, his father said.

The younger Koenig lived in Vancouver from 1989 to 1992, after having guest-starred on an episode of the TV series 21 Jump Street, which was shot in the city.

Police focused their search on Stanley Park last week, because he was said to enjoy walking its paths and trails.

The last time he contacted his parents was Feb. 9. His cellphone last received a text Feb. 16, the same day there was "bank activity in Vancouver," his father said.

Pro-Israel campaign says size isn't everything

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Sure, it's a little on the small side, but size doesn't matter to Rebecca Cherniak.

Cherniak, chair of Israel affairs and advocacy for the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS), helped organize the Size Doesn't Matter campaign, which uses videos, a website and a speaker series to highlight Israel's accomplishments in medicine, technology, science, business and humanitarian aid.

A centrepiece is the campaign's cheeky first video, which can be viewed on Facebook and YouTube. It shows a Canadian woman telling her Israeli boyfriend, who appears to be naked, that "it's small... I don't think I could go there."

The camera eventually pans to a map of Israel and ends with a website address.

"The video is provocative and risqué. It's meant to achieve a certain goal. The goal is that the video grabs attention and turns heads," Cherniak said.

"It causes people to be a little bit curious. That leads them to click on the link, once at the website, there's access to a huge amount of resources."

The campaign, which encompasses 23 Canadian universities and partners with local Hillels and Jewish Student Association groups, waslaunched before Israeli Apartheid Week, an annual event that began in Toronto and spread to 40 other cities.

"IAW is a week of intimidation and hateful speakers," Cherniak said. "By [launching early], we're not responding, we're able to set the terms... we create an attitude of positivity."

The campaign's website and advertising veers from the usual blue and white advocacy posters that typically plaster university walls. Instead, it uses bright colours and provocative images, including a scantily clad model.

Strengthening ties among young Jews

Fourth of a series

"Our mission is service to the Jewish people and service to the world," Menahem Ben-Sasson, president of The Hebrew University of Jerusalem (Jan. 31, 2010).

In 1960, 37-year-old musician, scholar, educator David Kaplan came to Saskatoon from the United States to teach at the University of Saskatchewan. The future conductor of the Saskatoon Symphony Orchestra and future member of the Order of Canada brought rigour, substance and innovation to music-related education at the university, in the province and, indeed, in the country.

He also brought a six-year-old son, Jonathan.

Some 50 years after his arrival in Canada, Jonathan spoke to The CJN from an office on Mount Scopus at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem about the Rothberg International School (RIS), of which he is the director of the division of undergraduate studies.

RIS is an administrative, teaching and social centre co-ordinating under one roof the various programs and activities that serve the needs of Hebrew U students from overseas. The precursor of RIS began its operations in 1955 when the one-year program for American and Canadian students was instituted. It opened its doors on Mount Scopus in an expanded programmatic form nearly 40 years ago, in 1971.

Ever since those first heady days of 1971, the school's programs have been continuously revised to attract and accommodate as many foreign students as possible to the university. Thus, today, there are programs for graduate and undergraduate students. The undergraduate program has two divisions. As Kaplan explained, one is geared to younger freshman, perhaps on their "gap" year; the other to students seeking more advanced studies.

The traditional curricular offerings at the school are courses in Jewish, Israeli and Mideast studies. But, flowing with our modern green times, the school has recently added courses in psychology, environmental studies and business.

"New programs are constantly being developed to match programs more precisely to the changing interests of the students," Kaplan said.

He emphasized that expanding the range of courses available to foreign students is part of the RIS central mission of helping foreign students feel at home at Hebrew U.

In distinct and deliberate echo of the mission of the university as articulated by its president, Menahem Ben-Sasson, RIS reaches out to and receives hundreds of foreign students each year from around the globe, most but not all of whom are from Jewish homes.

Jonathan Kaplan

For the academic year 2008/2009, 1,979 foreign students were enrolled at RIS. Of that number, 99 were from Canada. The largest contingent, not surprisingly, came from the United States. There were 916 Americans.

If the foreign students are enrolled in the undergraduate program, they will happily come under Kaplan's protective purview. And that's a good thing for them. For he is a congenial, gregarious enthusiastic individual exuding the warmth, friendliness and openness for which the Prairies are famous.

We spoke of one of Saskatchewan's favourite sons, Mr. Hockey himself, Gordie Howe. At the mere mention of Howe's name, Kaplan tumbled playfully back in time to his formative Canadian years and into a whimsy of nostalgia and reminiscence about his days watching and playing hockey.

Kaplan grew up in Saskatoon in "a very Jewishly committed home" as well as a devotedly Zionistic one. He was active in the Western Canada Region of Young Judaea and made aliyah in 1972. He fought in the Yom Kippur War, and after his army service, specialized in the study of Jewish history.

"One of the purposes of the varied program at RIS," Kaplan told The CJN, "is to strengthen – in a warm and caring atmosphere – the ties of young Jewish people to their history and to their roots." He emphasized that "RIS makes a large commitment to fostering Jewish identity and nurturing a strong belief in Jewish history" among the Jewish students at the school.

The expanded sense of Jewish self returns home with the students when they leave Jerusalem to continue their studies in Canada, or wherever they call home.

In strengthening their ties to their history and their roots, the RIS also strengthens students' ties to each other, to the friendships that are formed from the shared experiences of their year or more together and from the shared experiences of an ancient and modern peoplehood they have also discovered on Mount Scopus – in no small part, thanks to one of Saskatoon's finest sons, Jonathan Kaplan.

Audit reports rise in anti-Semitic incidents

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Anti-Israel agitators, far-left groups and "Islamists" have "latched onto Nazi motifs and age-old anti-Jewish stereotypes" and are pushing up the number of incidents of anti-Semitism, according to a survey released last week.

"Anti-Jewish messaging is spiralling out of control with the resurrection of the old canards and calumnies of the past," states the 2009 Audit of Antisemitic Incidents by B'nai Brith Canada. "These have become the norm, not the exception, in many of the incidents classified in this audit."

In its survey of anti-Semitic incidents for the 2009 calendar year, B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights recorded 1,264 incidents, an 11.4 per cent increase over the year before. Nearly 70 per cent of the incidents were classified as "harassment," including verbal slurs, while 27.5 per cent were described as "vandalism" such as graffiti. Only 32 cases of violence were reported, or 2.5 per cent of the total.

The audit found that incidents of anti-Semitism have risen fairly consistently, from less than 300 such occurrences 10 years ago. Going back further, the rise in reported incidents is even greater: "When the League released its first audit 28 years ago, the number of reported incidents was only 63," B'nai Brith said.

The first three months of the year saw the largest number of anti-Jewish events – 16 per cent of the total in January alone – while an additional 268 events were registered in February and March. Those spikes coincided with tensions connected to Israel's military operation in Gaza and paralleled a similar jump in incidents during the 2006 war in Lebanon.

The elevated levels continued into February and March, largely due to "the aggressive atmosphere in campuses" connected to Israeli Apartheid Week, the audit suggested.

Another spike took place in September, when 105 incidents were recorded, coinciding with the High Holidays, "when across Canada, 10 synagogues were the subject of attack in that month alone. Four of them, in Quebec, had their windows smashed in what looked like a co-ordinated attack just before the holiest day of the Jewish calendar, Yom Kippur."

In releasing the report, Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith's executive vice-president, called it "a barometer of the times." Parents are calling B'nai Brith for advice on which campuses are safest for their children. Jewish students were chased to a club room by anti-Israel agitators at an event at York University last year while "hate-fests" on campus have led to Jew- and Israel-bashing, he said.

He was particularly critical of York University, which recently shut down a pro-Israel event after organizers could not meet onerous conditions, including paying for police security. Don't expect similar conditions to be placed on opponents of Israel, Dimant suggested.

Anticipating arguments that the audit is exaggerating anti-Semitism (the National Post ran an editorial saying the audit treats serious assaults on par with schoolyard taunts when compiling its statistics), Dimant said B'nai Brith is not "fear-mongering."

"We are living the anti-Semitism that is written in the [audit]. Not every Jew, but certainly enough who face the ugly face of anti-Semitism in this country."

He said Jews who hide their kippahs or Stars of David, who don't wear obviously Jewish garb or who avoid pro-Israel comments in social situations can avoid anti-Semitism.

He said education in core Canadian values such as tolerance is an antidote to the problem.

Anita Bromberg, B'nai Brith's national director of legal affairs, said 17 cases reported in the audit led to police charges. She suggested an absence of political will was limiting the number of criminal cases, while Dimant said police are reluctant to identify certain incidents as hate crimes.

Turning back to campuses, Dimant suggested the labelling of Israel as an "apartheid state" could be a red herring aimed at deflecting attention from a real issue.

"We need to emphasize what is the driving force for these groups on campus," he said. "The world is today fighting a very dangerous element of radical Islam, which is a threat to this country and is being ignored."

"The New Klezmorim – Voices in the Revival of Yiddish Music"
- presented by Director David Kaufman
Sunday, March 7th, at 7:30 pm

In the 1970's the descendents of Ashkenazi Jewish immigrants re-awakened an interest and passion in the music their parents brought with them from Europe. In "The New Klezmorim," director David Kaufman takes audiences into the spirit of the Klezmer revival as experienced at the KlezCanada Yiddish culture retreat in 1998. This fascinating documentary features performances by some of the most talented figures in Yiddish music, including Brave Old World, Adrienne Cooper, the late Bruce Adler and Josh Waletsky. ADMISSION IS FREE.

Kudos to our students

There's no denying it. The web-based advocacy campaign on behalf of Israel organized and launched last week by the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS) called Size Doesn't Matter was provocative and – let's admit it – for people well past their student days, perhaps even uncomfortable.

As reported in The CJN, the centrepiece of the campaign is a sly, cheeky video that shows a Canadian woman in bed with her Israeli boyfriend conversing with overtly sexual allusions about a subject that eventually turns out to be the size of Israel. At the end of the suggestive banter between the two, the camera pans to a map of Israel. The map is an entry point to a website address that offers listings of cultural and other events from 23 Canadian university and college campuses regarding film screenings and a speaker series that highlight the many accomplishments of the tiny Jewish state – for example, in medicine, technology, science, business and humanitarian aid – that the organizers of Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) do not want other students to know about.

And that is the whole point of the CFJS campaign.

It brings the broader, more accurate message about Israel to a very wide swath of students who otherwise might simply accept the IAW calumnies unchallenged as truth, or simply not care to know anything about the Jewish state. Thus far, the campaign has been very successful. It is working. In merely its first five days, there were some 25,000 viewings of the video and more than12,000 entries from across the country into the comprehensive information site about Israel.

Rebecca Cherniak, chair of Israel affairs and advocacy for the CFJS, told The CJN that the campaign "is for the 80 per cent [of students] in the middle, not for students who love Israel or hate Israel, but for the students who can't even point out Israel on the map. It causes people to be a little bit curious. That leads them to click on the link. once at the website, there's access to a huge amount of resources."

"Students were not satisfied with the way Israel was represented on campus, Cherniak added. "We took it into our hands to show the Israel that we know. It's a different way of looking at Israel."

Deborah Mechanic, a third-year kinesiology student at York University, may have spoken for a great many students when she told The CJN: "I've been at York three years and my experience with Apartheid Week is lots of fighting and lots of culture clashing. [The CFJS campaign] feels a little more refreshing than the traditional campaigning to defend our country… [it shows] not just how Israel isn't wrong, but how it's good."

Cherniak, her colleagues at CFJS and the communal organizations that helped enable them deserve high praise for their work. The CFJS may not have used the language or the methods of their parents, but they are doing what their parents cannot do as well as they do: reach their peers and communicate to their fellow students on campus the positive message that tiny Israel is a thriving democracy worthy of their understanding, if not active support, and also, that Am Yisrael Chai.

25 years ago in The CJN

Nine hours after beginning deliberations, a 12-person jury found Toronto printer Ernst Zundel guilty of deliberately publishing lies about the Holocaust. Speaking to reporters from the prisoner's dock immediately after his eight-week trial, Zundel promised he would appeal the verdict.

Campus pro-Israel campaign

After weeks of planning, the pro-Israel campaign took shape and has begun on campuses across the country. In an effort to present Israel in a perspective not usually seen by university students, Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) assisted students in creating the "Size Doesn't Matter" campaign. The idea is to capture people's attention with the seemingly provocative slogan, with a subtitle that is customized for each campus. The University of Calgary Hillel adopted "Size Doesn't Matter: Israel, Small Country, Big Appetite for Peace." The campaign began without a hitch, and students were interested in the information available at the tables. The week is full of speakers, movies and events. Yasher Koach to CIJA and the United Jewish Appeal for excellent creativity and quality resources!

U of T anti-Semitism: don't assign blame

As a current social worker and former social work student I read "Anti-Semitic incidents at U of T condemned" (Feb. 18) with much gratitude, concern and hope. I commend dean Faye Mishna for clearly and forcefully declaring that there is no place for anti-Semitism or any other form of discrimination at the University of Toronto. Along with colleagues, I further applaud her for spearheading awareness and educational programs with a commitment to fostering constructive dialogue around the two specific incidents and explore ways to ensure that any form of hate will ever be tolerated within the classroom setting and beyond.

This process should not be about assigning blame, be it toward U of T's Factor-Inwentash Faculty of Social Work, including Prof. Rupaleem Bhuyan, who I believe is a fine teacher, social worker and human being, nor its learned students. What also needs to be acknowledged is that social workers live in a world where, unfortunately, hateful beliefs and practices, including anti-Semitism, are all too prevalent. No part of society is immune from expressions of hate, including institutions of higher learning and a profession committed to the principles of tikkun olam.

May members of this community be blessed with patience, insight and compassion to bring the ugliness of these incidents out into the light, and in so doing experience journeys of transformative learning and growth.

One missing word says it all

I was sympathetic to Rabbi Reuven Bulka's concerns regarding the "conversion crisis," that haredi demands for exclusive control of the conversion process throughout the Jewish world have grave implications, including the invalidation of his own conversions ("Some observations on the conversion crisis," Perspectives, Feb. 4). But I read his article with chagrin, realizing that one missing word shows that he is to some extent complicit in his own predicament.

Rabbi Bulka describes how he reluctantly began supervising conversions because "no other rabbi in my area was willing to do this." I suspect, however, that there may have been at least a Reform or Conservative rabbi supervising conversions. By not specifying that there was no other Orthodox rabbi doing conversions, we realize where the problem lies.

In your Feb. 18 edition, in his letter, Rabbi Edward Elkin ably describes how non-Orthodox rabbis take a serious approach to conversion that falls within Rabbi Bulka's spectrum of halachic conversion. But we must nevertheless still warn our candidates that their conversion will be accepted officially by very few Orthodox rabbis.

Rabbi Bulka has done much to strengthen the Canadian Jewish community, but his approach to conversions, to some extent, is responsible for my pain, his own pain, and particularly for the pain of the converts I sponsor.

Since his own conversions are now potentially being called into question by the haredi establishment, I encourage him to work toward creating a unified beit din in concert with his non-Orthodox colleagues in our nation's capital.

Funding sources of Israeli NGOs

For the New Israel Fund to object to an attempt to clarify the funding sources of NGOs in Israel and to wrap this in the flag of democratic values is clearly an attempt at obfuscation ("Fierce debate in Israel over campaign against NIF," Perspectives, Feb. 18). Let the truth come out, as there is a "right to know" who are the funding sources of our moral beacons – both left wing and right wing.

Not easy when Purim coincides with Israeli Apartheid Week

By NORA GOLD
Special to The CJN

This past Saturday and Sunday we celebrated Purim, and then on Monday, we faced the beginning of Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW). For those unfamiliar with IAW, this is an annual, weeklong, anti-Israel hate-fest that started in 2005 at University of Toronto and now takes place in 40 locations around the world. Here in Toronto, U of T's main campus is in the downtown core, so for many of us, there is the feeling each year at this time that all of Toronto has been taken over by IAW.

Nora Gold

When I first noticed that there would be a convergence this year between IAW and Purim, I found this quite thought-provoking.

Purim, of course, is a holiday about the vagaries of history and the remarkable capacity of our people to survive in an unpredictable and hate-filled world. The proximity of IAW to Purim reminds us with vividness and immediacy that, despite all the differences between ancient Persia and present-day Canada, we still live in a world where anti-Semitism exists and we have enemies who seek to destroy us.

Even without Purim adjoining it, IAW is an intensely uncomfortable time for many Jews, and an agonizing one for those of us who love Israel. For me (an Israeli citizen and a passionate left-wing Zionist), this weeklong attack on Israel is a weeklong attack on me. I might feel otherwise if IAW were a week of honest, balanced critique of Israel, but this is not the case.

IAW uses the false analogy between Israel and apartheid South Africa to try and delegitimize, and ultimately destroy, the State of Israel. It thus becomes a true analogy to Haman.

So what can we do during this difficult week to respond to the old-new hatred of IAW? I found myself talking about this last week at U of T's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, after screening a film I made about my research on Toronto Jewish girls and their experiences of anti-Semitism. Afterwards, during the discussion, one woman said she is afraid to wear a pendant with a Jewish star on it in public because of the response she might get. I'd heard this kind of statement dozens of times before when conducting a national study with Jewish women from across Canada, and as I told this young woman, I understand her reaction. It is, after all, reality-based, because we live in an anti-Semitic time.

That said, one of the great lessons of Purim is that, given the choice between flight and fight, fighting is the better option.

Esther, with Mordechai's encouragement, fought back against Haman, and that's part of why we're here today. Furthermore, the strategies Esther used to defeat Haman were unorthodox and creative, and we must employ this same creativity in response to our enemies today.

To offer just one example: last week, coming out of a movie in a downtown theatre, I caught sight of a table with all sorts of flyers on it, and sure enough, along with all the others, was a pile of bookmarks advertising IAW. I was just starting to grumble to myself, when someone on the other side of the room called my name, so I turned away from the table to wave to her and say hi. Moments later, I turned back to the table, and to my astonishment, saw that all the IAW bookmarks were gone. There had been only one other person with me near that table – a woman whose distinctly patterned bright jacket I had happened to notice. Now I recognized her by the back of this jacket – this woman was striding quickly out of the theatre.

This poster from two years ago is typical of the anti-Israel messages delivered during Israeli Apartheid Week.

I don't know this woman and I'll never know her exact motive for scooping up all those bookmarks. But I do know the intense relief and elation that flooded me, knowing that at least at that theatre, none of those lying bookmarks would reach the dozens of innocent Torontonians going to the movies that evening.

I also found this incident startling, because it closely echoed something that happens in my (as yet unpublished) novel, Exile. Here, a university student stands for a long time in front of a poster that calls for a boycott of Israel, vacillating over whether or not to tear it down – in the end, she does. (This scene, by the way, can be read on my website: noragold.com.) So life imitates art, I thought, standing in the lobby of that movie theatre, watching my secret ally escaping out the door.

I am not, heaven forbid, advocating that any of us do anything that violates the rule of law or in any way dishonours ourselves or our community. But we must, each of us individually, try and do at least one thing this week that expresses our rejection of, and resistance to, IAW. The good efforts of our community's institutions to combat IAW do not absolve us from our individual responsibility to fight this vileness ourselves wherever we can. For inspiration, think of Esther. Think of her courage. This is the essential message of Purim.

So let's be happy it's Adar.

As we survived Haman long ago, we will also survive our current enemies. And in the meantime, as we struggle against them, let's remember to rejoice and be happy, because this is the true survival of our people. As we did a few nights ago, we will on Purim year after year – God willing – read the Megillah, eat a hamantash and drink until we can't tell the difference between Israeli Apartheid Week and Purim.

And she tears the poster off the wall

From Exile, a novel by Nora Gold

Judith, a master's student waiting to see her professor Suzy, notices a poster calling for a boycott of Israel. Shocked, then furious, she inwardly rants for awhile.

Then, staring at the poster, Judith thinks: Someone should tear this down. This poster isn't a representation of freedom of expression; it's hate literature. It encourages everyone who sees it to hate one specific group of people and try to hurt them. Someone has to take it down. But who? I can't. I can't just tear down a poster.

Or maybe I can.

Judith peeks around the corner of the alcove. Out in the hallway there are two people ahead of her waiting for Suzy. I have at least 10 minutes till it's my turn, thinks Judith. She ducks back into the alcove and scans the poster top to bottom: on the top there's an invitation to an anti-Israel rally; below it, the call to boycott "apartheid Israel." This poster is obscene, thinks Judith. It's disgusting. Someone has to tear it down.

But she can't do it. It feels wrong. You don't go around ripping other people's stuff off walls, thinks Judith. If you do that, then you're no better than the people who put up this kind of crap. You've descended to their level. Posters are free speech. They're democracy, she thinks. If I rip down this poster, I'm ripping the fabric of democracy. I may not agree with what this poster says, but "I'll defend to the death its right to say it." Whoever put this up had every right to.

Yeah, thinks Judith. But then equally I have the right to tear it down. That's democracy, too: multiple voices, each expressing its own reality. The person who put up this poster may perceive Israel as the most scumbag country in the world. But I have a right to disagree. I also have the right to speak. With my lips. Or with my hands.

But violence, thinks Judith. Violence... Not only is it wrong, it's illegal. This poster is university property, it has the university stamp on it, I could get into trouble for tearing it down.

Now Judith sees herself standing in front of the poster and hesitating – to tear or not to tear – and she laughs at herself. She's being ridiculous. Throughout history, Jews have performed acts of courage, for instance in the Warsaw Ghetto. Risking their lives every day to help others. And she can't even pull down a stupid poster. Her and her namby-pamby left-wing sensibilities. Keeping her from doing what she knows she should.

Now Judith thinks of her name. Judith in the Bible lopped off Holofernes' head without even batting an eyelash. With less hesitation than she has now over tearing down a poster. Come on, Judith tells herself. Be strong like your name. Doubt, dither, deliberate all you want first, if it makes you feel like a better person. Agonize to your heart's content, like Raskolnikov. But then in the end, act. Sartre was right: ultimately there is nothing but action.

Judith reaches out her hand. Act, she thinks. Do it. Have some impact on the world.

And she tears the poster off the wall.

Opinions

Religious revival?

A new Masorti (Conservative) prayer book in Israel had been on the country's bestseller list. As Orthodox worshippers use texts that reflect their own background and customs, they aren't likely to buy this one. The number of Masorti Jews who attend synagogue services is too small to account for the sales. It seems, therefore, that most of those who have acquired the new siddur are Israelis who don't describe themselves as religious and will probably never take it to services.

Rabbi Dan Marmur in Toronto

But though they may not pray, they want to know. The book has interesting commentaries and explanations for people eager to learn about Judaism, even if they don't practise it. They may not pray, but they'll read the book by themselves or, more likely, study it in one of the many informal groups that have come into existence in recent years to explore Jewish tradition in depth. They may choose a prayer book instead of a biblical or rabbinic text, because they want more than intellectual insights.

The distinction between religion, which doesn't have a good name in Israel, and spirituality, which is something that many seek in Judaism and may have learned about in the course of their travels in the Far East, challenges the conventional division between religious and secular. Although many Israelis put themselves in the latter category, they're nevertheless in search of what's beyond the material and the social. That's what makes a new liturgical text intriguing and attractive.

Organized religious movements may see here an opportunity to acquire adherents. Though some secular Jews do become "born again" and join one or other haredi, often chassidic, group, most will only get involved when celebrating life cycle events, because these are individual and personal – "spiritual" rather than "religious."

Until a few decades ago, virtually everybody would choose Orthodox institutions for such occasions, assuming that only these are authentic. Nowadays, however, both Reform and Conservative congregations are in considerable demand for bar and bat mitzvah celebrations and wedding ceremonies. And some who take advantage of non-Orthodox synagogues stay to pray. It accounts for much of the steady growth of the two movements.

It's too early to predict the future of Judaism in Israel and, through Israel's influence, in the Diaspora. But these developments point to a possible religious revival. Some of it may work in favour of existing institutions, but most will manifest itself in settings without the benefit of clergy. The new trend is bound to be post-denominational and post-halachic. Schools that now train rabbis take note.

The Jewish calendar revealed

In this period between Purim and Pesach the Hebrew calendar seems to take on special significance. For one thing, we're commanded in the Torah to take special note of the month of Nisan. God instructs Moses and Aaron that Nisan will be considered the first of the months. The children of Israel will witness things in Nisan that they'll never forget, and they'll be asked to participate in those events proactively, in a way unlike anything they'd experienced in their previous lives as slaves.

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

They are to sacrifice a lamb and eat all of it, as would a privileged free person. They are to "borrow" precious objects from their Egyptian neighbours and keep them. They are to witness tragedy all around them while they stay safe. They will leave their slavery behind them and walk into the wilderness. They are to hear from Moses of future generations that will mark this month with annual celebration. Slaves for whom days, weeks, months and years had little significance are taught to see the new moon of Nisan as the beginning of their new history as free men and women.

In addition, we're more aware of the season, since Pesach requires so much preparation. I am always amazed at how supermarkets in Jewish neighbourhoods begin to sell Pesach foods immediately after Purim. Our Hebrew calendar, which serves such a tiny percentage of the world's population, has affected the marketing tactics of huge supermarket chains. And this is North America, where just a few decades ago it seemed like Jewish life was doomed to a very minor role in the larger magnetic society.

Our calendar thrives in all of its uniqueness. Have you noticed the differences between our calendar and others around us? People think of the Christian calendar as solar and ours as lunar. That's not precisely true. The Christian calendar is solar, and the Muslim calendar is lunar, but the Hebrew calendar is lunar/solar. Our year is lunar, but we add a month from time to time in order to keep the festivals in their proper solar season. Nisan and its Pesach will always be in the spring of the northern hemisphere. The Muslim calendar, which is completely lunar, has feasts and fasts that move throughout the solar year. Ramadan travels from winter through summer across the solar years.

Another interesting difference is what we name and what we don't name in our calendar. Both the Christian and Jewish calendars name years (2010 and 5770) and months (March and Nisan), but the Christian calendar names days of the week and ours doesn't. Wednesday in Hebrew is Yom Revii, but originally it was Yom Revii la'Shabbat, the fourth day toward Shabbat. Only one day in our week has a real name, while the others are just counting up to Shabbat. Most importantly, though, the week, which is an artificial construct of the Creation story, has no name in the Christian calendar, but a very significant name in the Jewish calendar. The week that ends with Shabbat is named after the portion of Torah that we read on Mondays, Thursdays and Shabbat. And that name is much more than a mere label. It flavours the entire week with its narrative, its laws, its values, its memories and its sacred history.

For example, this week is Ki Tisa, a rich portion from the book of Exodus. It brings to mind the half-shekel census, Bezalel the artist, the sin of the Golden Calf, Moses' argument with God, intimacies of Moses with his brother and with God, and the restoration of the tablets of the covenant. The Torah portion in all of its detail, the many commentaries, and the accompanying Haftorah are the values-content of each week in the Jewish calendar.

Ever since the commandment in Exodus 12 to note the month of Nisan, time itself has become a sacred medium of Jewish life.

Veiling men

The blogosphere is abuzz with reports of a new item in the haredi marketplace: a "personal mechitzah" designed to protect its bearer from the spiritual hazards of air travel. The story originated in the Jerusalem Post and was quoted verbatim and at length on both Orthodox and liberal Jewish blogs and fora, where the item was criticized, praised and analyzed.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

A mechitzah, of course, is the physical barrier separating the sexes in traditional prayer services. Citing the "Rabbinical Council for Public Transportation," reports describe the personal mechitzah as a compact nylon device designed to create a small, private enclosure around one's head, attaching with velcro to one's airplane seat. Promoted as a solution to the dual dangers of airline films and immodestly dressed fellow passengers, it permits its bearer to study sacred texts or pray free from forbidden distractions.

Bloggers and forum comments are divided between taking the story seriously and taking it as a Purim hoax. One blog – obviously working on the latter assumption – posted what is purportedly an exclusive advance photo of the mechitzah in a new El Al ad campaign. It shows a man and woman seated side by side in executive class airline seats (not the kind that go flatbed). The man's head and upper torso have disappeared into a cylindrical mesh laundry basket. As of this writing, no other photos have surfaced.

Many online commentators take the story seriously, either bemoaning it as another example of chumrot gone wild, or mulling its possibilities for enhancing spirituality or adherence to Halachah. (A chumrah is a stringency that isn't required by Halachah.) Interestingly, many who are sympathetic to the idea saw the personal mechitzah as an educational device to shield children from things deemed harmful to their development, although the initial story said the target market was adult haredi men.

Time will tell whether the personal mechitzah is for real, and if so, whether it will find customers. But the concept caught my attention and – in one respect – I embrace it. To my mind, it reverses the responsibilities and positions assigned to genders – and not only in Judaism, but in other religions, too.

The focus on tzniyut, or modest dress, for women and the segregation of the sexes are said to protect the dignity of women from the lascivious gazes of men, and to protect men from the distraction of female sexuality, especially (but not only) during prayer and sacred study. Either way, the concern is with what men can see. What I find innovative (perhaps unintentionally) about the personal mechitzah is that rather than cloaking women, it shields men's eyes.

I imagine the personal mechitzah, which is said to extend closely around the face, to resemble a burqa or niqab, only it's more radical, because here the eyes, too, are blocked completely. The woman is veiled because she might distract or entice men. The man is veiled, as it were, because he doesn't want to be distracted.

You might say that the personal mechitzah connotes taking responsibility for one's own spiritual welfare, rather than foisting it on someone else. In other words, it's up to the distracted and distractable ones, not the distractions, to control themselves.

Imagine the possibilities for halachic innovation. Instead of separate realms for men and women that take women away from the spiritual action, traditional shuls might allow people to sit where they choose, but have them wear mechitzot. At last a solution to the barring of women's minyanim at the Kotel – objectors can simply wear the mechitzah.

But other spaces are also potential venues: the mall, subways, buses, university classes. Unlike a woman's veil, always required in public – because who knows when someone, upon seeing a woman, might have unwanted thoughts – the personal mechitzah could be donned and doffed at will, when necessary. Its uses would be determined by both external circumstances and internal conditions. It opens new possibilities for tolerance, as the focus of behaviour is aimed inward – how the self responds and reacts – rather than outward – what the other does.

I can already imagine product names: Porta-chitzah. Mechitzah-me. My-chitzah. Manveil. I jest, but only somewhat. Whether or not it's a viable product, I like the gender flipping inherent in the concept: governing oneself, restricting oneself, and not the other.

The Kirshner File

Israel's 'Superman'

The Jan. 19 assassination of Hamas commander Mahmoud al-Mabhouh in Dubai – a statelet in the United Arab Emirates – was a classic cloak-and-dagger operation worthy of a crackling spy novel by, say, John le Carré. The incident featured a shadowy hit squad whose members carried fraudulent British, Irish, German and French passports and were attired in tennis shorts, hats, false beards and wigs and glasses.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Suspicion immediately fell on the Mossad, Israel's national intelligence agency, since Israel had a compelling motive to kill him. Aside from being implicated in the 1989 kidnapping and murder of two Israeli soldiers, Ilan Saadon and Avi Sasportas, Mabhouh was supposedly a key figure in procuring Iranian arms for Hamas, which has controlled the Gaza Strip since June 2007.

By coincidence, Mabhouh's murder took place as Israeli Minister of National Infrastructure Uzi Landau attended an international conference on alternative energy in neighbouring Abu Dhabi.

In keeping with its policy of ambiguity in such cases, Israel at first neither confirmed nor denied its involvement in the murky affair. Later, Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman claimed that there is no evidence to link Israel to the murder. Dubai's police chief, however, said he was 99 per cent certain the Mossad was behind it. Meanwhile, Israel's ambassadors to Britain, Ireland, France and Germany were asked for an explanation and British Prime Minister Gordon Brown said he would launch a full investigation.

Meir Dagan

The fate that befell Mabhouh cast new light on Israel's covert policy of targeted killings and on the Mossad's current director, Meir Dagan.

It is no secret that Israel has resorted to morally ambiguous assassinations as a response to terrorism. In 2006, Israel's Supreme Court sanctioned extra-judicial killings as a legitimate form of self-defence under certain conditions.

During the early 1960s, when Israel was in a state of war with Egypt, the long arm of the Mossad went after German scientists helping the Egyptians develop long-range ballistic missiles. These rocket experts, having honed their skills in Nazi Germany, were the targets of letter bombs directed by one of the Mossad's most legendary operatives, Wolfgang Lotz, who operated in Egypt under cover as a German horse breeder and bon vivant.

In the wake of the Munich massacre of 11 Israeli athletes at the 1972 summer Olympic Games, the Mossad embarked on Operation Wrath of God. The targets were Palestine Liberation Organization figures such as Abdel Wael Zwaiter and Mahmoud Hamshari, who were directly or indirectly involved in the hostage-taking drama. They were killed in a succession of cities in Europe. Munich's alleged mastermind, Ali Hassan Salameh, was assassinated in Beirut in 1979.

In tandem with Operation Wrath of God, the Israeli army, in Operation Spring of Youth, landed commandos in Beirut under the command of Ehud Barak – Israel's current defence minister – to eliminate three leading Palestinian officials close to PLO head Yasser Arafat, Mohammed Najar, Kamal Adwan and Kamal Nasser.

The first operation was the subject of a book by Canadian writer George Jonas, Vengeance, as well as a TV movie, Sword of Gideon. The first batch of assassinations and the Beirut raid were recreated by Steven Spielberg in a feature film, Munich.

In 1988, Israeli commandos hunted down and killed Khalil al-Wazir, a founder of Fatah, in Tunis. The raid was apparently spearheaded by Moshe Ya'alon, currently a cabinet minister in Benjamin Netanyahu's government and a former chief of staff of the Israeli army. In 1990, a Canadian engineer and ballistics expert who had been developing a supergun for Iraq, Gerald Bull, was gunned down in Brussels.

The Mossad was blamed for his murder.

The secretary general of Hezbollah, Abbas Musawi, was killed in 1992 when Israeli helicopters fired missiles at his car in southern Lebanon.

Fathi Shikaki, the leader of Islamic Jihad, was fatally shot in Malta in 1995 by assassins said to be Mossad agents.

Yahya Ayyash (The Engineer), Hamas' most accomplished bomb maker, was killed in 1996 when his cellphone exploded in his hand. Hamas fingered Israel as the culprit.

Imad Mughniyah

Khaled Meshal, a top-ranking Hamas official living in Jordan in exile, was the object of a Mossad assassination attempt in 1997. The Mossad agents, carrying forged Canadian passports, were captured. They were released after Israel supplied an antidote to save Meshal's life and freed Hamas' spiritual leader, Sheik Ahmed Yassin, from prison. The incident strained Israel's strategic relationship with Jordan and forced the director of the Mossad to resign.

With the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising in 2000, the Israeli army and the Shin Bet – Israel's internal security agency – launched what would be a concerted campaign of targeted assassinations to wipe out the leaders and foot soldiers of the revolt (an event that hardened Israel's perception of the Palestinians). The first Palestinian leader to be killed was Hussein Abayat, a 34-year-old resident of Bethlehem. His vehicle was struck by a laser-guided rocket fired from an Israeli army helicopter on Nov. 9 of that year.

From 2000 to 2008, Israel killed 234 Palestinians associated with the uprising – notably Yassin and his successor, Abdul Aziz al-Rantisi, and the founder of Hamas' military wing in Gaza, Salah Shihada, who died after an Israeli F-16 jet dropped a one-ton bomb on his house.

Since 2002, the Mossad has been directed by Dagan, who commanded an undercover unit in Gaza in the early 1970s and an armoured brigade in the 1982 war in Lebanon. During the 1990s, he advised the director of the Shin Bet and the general staff on terrorism. Dagan was appointed to his present position by Ariel Sharon, the prime minister of the day. In an unmistakable sign of the esteem in which he is generally held, Dagan's tenure has been extended three times by two prime ministers, Ehud Olmert and his successor, Netanyahu. Only two of Dagan's predecessors, Isser Harel (1952-1963) and Yitzhak Hofi (1974-1982), have served longer.

Dagan's longevity is no mystery. Widely regarded as an unusually tough taskmaster, he has been extremely effective. "In my opinion, no terrorist should feel immune, anywhere," he said in an interview 12 years ago.

Aggressively acting on his beliefs, Dagan has reportedly foiled three major Islamist attacks on Israeli embassies in Africa and Asia. In addition, he has directed a clandestine campaign against Iran's budding nuclear project. Indeed, Iran blamed Israel for the recent assassination of nuclear scientist Massoud Mohammadi in Tehran. Writing in Al Ahram, Egyptian columnist Ashraf Abu al-Haul dubbed Dagan "Israel's Superman," claiming that the Iranian nuclear program "would have taken off years ago" had it not been for "this man."

Credited with ordering the killing of two pivotal Hezbollah officials in Beirut in 2003 and 2004, he allegedly played a central role in Israel's decision to bomb Syria's incomplete nuclear facility in 2007. As well, he is said to have ordered the 2008 assassination of a Syrian general, Muhammed Suleiman, who apparently funnelled weapons to Hezbollah. Last year, Dagan was reportedly involved in an Israeli air strike on a Hamas convoy in Sudan transporting Iranian arms to Gaza.

In his greatest known coup, Dagan is said to have worked on the assassination of Imad Mughniyah, one of Hezbollah's most important and dangerous commanders. He was killed by a car bomb in Damascus on Feb. 12, 2008. Having accused Israel of murdering him, Hassan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's secretary general, has vowed vengeance.

Dagan is unlikely to be deterred by such threats, which should be taken seriously.

Trustee wants TDSB to condemn Apartheid Week

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

James Pasternak, the school board trustee for York Centre, has drafted a motion asking the chair and director of the Toronto District School Board to condemn Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW), held annually at the University of Toronto and other institutions.

Pasternak's motion urges chair Bruce Davis and director Christopher Spence to sign a joint letter to U of T president, David Naylor, stating that the TDSB's education partners should share "ideals of respect, tolerance and the promotion of peace."

In an interview with The CJN, Pasternak noted that the university trains future teachers and works with the board in areas such as programs, research, recruitment and staffing.

The motion says the letter should urge U of T to ask IAW organizers "to find space elsewhere and ensure that [they're] forbidden from trying to undermine TDSB policies and setting up in TDSB schools."

Pasternak's concern is based in part on past "recruitment of TDSB high school students," the motion says.

> Concern based on past 'recruitment' of high school students

Two years ago, a teacher at the Student School, an alternative school affiliated with the TDSB, organized information sessions and brought students to an IAW event organized specifically for high school students, Pasternak said.

"We were very effective in working with the Student School and blocking any further activity," following a student's complaint, he added. "There was no real balance to the discussion of the Middle East and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. We have to present an honest and balanced dialogue in the search for peace. [IAW] merely demonizes Israel."

Pasternak also noted that some IAW events are hosted at U of T's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, "a teachers' college and a think tank, and many of the people end up working at our schools. I don't consider that a healthy environment."

IAW, which takes place this week and is now in its sixth year, encourages boycott, divestment and sanctions campaigns, and promotes the idea that Israel engages in "ethnic cleansing." It started in Toronto, but has spread to more than 40 cities including New York, Johannesburg, Melbourne and Pisa, as well as Canadian centres such as Edmonton, Guelph, Halifax, Kingston, London, Montreal, Ottawa, Peterborough, Vancouver, Waterloo and Winnipeg.

Pasternak, who plans to bring his motion to the TDSB board on Mar. 10, told The CJN last week that it's "our responsibility as a school board to make sure [efforts to bring in younger students] stop."

In a statement, he said, "This event is not a sincere and honest attempt to find common ground and peace in the Middle East. It presents one-sided misconceptions and distortions about the challenges in the Middle East. The title and content of this event is disparaging and demonizes."

He told The CJN that board members "value the relationship" the TDSB has with U of T. But, he added, "what we don't want is a situation in which organizers are trying to come into our high schools to spread this insidious ideology that is a contradiction of our policies."

Spence, the TDSB's designated spokesperson, was not reachable for comment by the time The CJN went to press.

Naylor was also not available for comment as The CJN went to press, but in a Feb. 24 letter about freedom of expression and diversity, which is posted on his website, he wrote that "when members of our community tell us that events or discussions may have violated university policies, we will assess those complaints quickly and take whatever actions are necessary to restore a safe environment for producing knowledge and discussing ideas."

Without mentioning IAW directly, Naylor wrote that freedom of speech is "a core value for any university in a democratic society." He also said the university wouldn't hesitate to intervene if there are safety concerns, or if speakers "migrate from advocacy to hate-promoting speech."

As well, he added, senior university staff will monitor events if they have reason to believe they could be used to target members of the community.

Ontario Legislature condemns Apartheid Week

The Ontario Legislature voted unanimously last week to condemn Israeli Apartheid Week, based on a motion introduced by Peter Shurman, Conservative MPP for Thornhill.

Peter Shurman

Passage of the resolution "sends a clear message to Ontarians and the rest of the world that use of the term 'apartheid,' in relation to the state of Israel, borders on hate speech, and... the events staged during Israeli Apartheid Week have no place in Ontario, particularly on its university campuses," Shurman said in a statement.

"'Israeli Apartheid Week' is just code for 'We hate Israel, and we don't want it to exist,'" he told The CJN.

Shurman, who is Jewish, said he doesn't object to criticism of Israel, and "that type of discussion should take place, with all sides represented... with respect to peace going forward, and people living together in harmony."

In a draft statement that was to be released Monday morning, national Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff also spoke out against Israeli Apartheid Week. The final version of his statement was not released until after The CJN went to press.

Passover food drive needs volunteers, donations

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The co-chairs of this year's Passover Food Drive, run by National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section, expect a lot more people on their recipient list to be from the middle class.

"The recession is now a few years old, and many people who have lost their jobs have used up their savings. This is resulting in a 10 per cent increase on our list," said Debbie Wasserman, who is co-chairing the 27th annual drive with Karen Fenwick.

Wasserman said that out of about 200,000 Jews in the Greater Toronto Area, 11 per cent live in poverty.

According to Statistics Canada, the 2006 low-income cut-off for a single person was about $17,570 after taxes, and for a family of four it was $33,221 after taxes.

She said that "this is a sad year, because we'll see recipients that do not necessarily fit the demographics of the program."

Fenwick said that referrals are accepted from agencies, synagogues, schools, service groups and chaplaincy services, and recipients include individuals living in poverty, recent immigrants in need, and individuals with disabilities and inadequate financial resources.

Debbie Wasserman and Karen Fenwick

Kosher for Passover food items are also made available to people in Jewish group homes, as well as to kosher food banks, Jewish homeless and incarcerated Jews.

Basic box ingredients include wine, apple juice, matzah, a jar or can of gefilte fish, vegetable soup, chicken soup, macaroons, tuna, jam, apple sauce, tea, crackers and oil, as well as a Haggadah and candles.

Fenwick said that when putting together their recipient list, organizers are respectful of people's privacy. "We only accept people who have agreed to receiving a box. Needing food is a very emotional experience, especially for those who have never needed it before.

"We stress to our volunteers that they should not judge people by where they live. Recipients could live in a house, but have no money.

"We have volunteers add greeting cards to the boxes, because we want them to know that they are packing the box for a specific person, not just a statistic."

Organizers are appealing to the community to turn up on delivery day, March 21 from 8:30 a.m.to noon, to help deliver boxes, and to make monetary donations to the drive which runs until March 18. Wasserman said "We do encourage donating food, because of the mitzvah of giving, but we can buy food wholesale, so our money goes a lot further."

If volunteers want to help out on delivery day, but have no means of transportation, they can always help out loading the cars with boxes, she said.

This year, as in past years, the community has been generous, she said. "This is a self-contained program, and the money that comes in funds the project. People have responded to our pleas and have given whole-heartedly."

About 1,500 people help out by sorting, packing and delivering boxes, a number of senior homes have raised money for the drive, and schools have placed bins so students can donate food, said Wasserman.

Three local Revera retirement residences are collecting kosher food and monetary donations.

Fenwick said that since last year's drive ended, organizers have been trying to create partnerships and find possible sponsors.

"We've asked the North York Harvest Food Bank to try and help us find Jewish clients, and hopefully they'll help us out with filling our boxes."

In Honour of Ida & Michael Finkelstein

This year's presenter and special guest is:

Dr. Michael W. Higgins

Senior Executive in Residence
Sacred Heart University, Fairfield, CT.
The lecture topic is:

LUMINOUS AND VEXED – BENEDICT XVI AND THE JEWS: A CONTORTED ALLIANCE

Joseph Ratzinger, Benedict XVI, is a theologian of the first order, a writer of great subtlety and insight, and a thinker capable of arresting epiphanies. Although John Paul II's trusted and long term ally, Benedict's relationship with the Jewish community, unlike that of his predecessor, has been fraught with misunderstandings, missteps, and media miscalculations.
Why? What gives? What is really going on?

Renewable energy centre reaches out to Canadians

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Advocates for The Eilat-Eilot Renewable Energy Technological Center are promoting the advantages of collaboration between Canadian and Israeli researchers.

"We're very eager to see greater co-operation between Canadian entities and Israeli entities in renewable energy specifically," said Jonathan Levy, the consul for economic affairs and trade commissioner at Israel's Economic Mission to Canada, in a phone interview.

The centre, which will be established this year in the Eilat-Eilot area, is a partnership between the Israeli government and private companies who specialize in renewable energy research and technology.

The government finalized plans for the centre in 2008 and will cover 50 per cent of its expenses. The ministry of industry, trade and labour will choose an entrepreneurial company to run the centre, which has a five-year commitment from the government and will partner with Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

The Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce hosted an information session on Feb. 23 for Canadian businesses and potential investors in the Eilat-Eilot centre. The session included talks from representatives of Israeli-based industrial groups who support the centre including Ben-Gurion University, Israeli investor Ligad Rotlevy and entrepreneurs Shai Schiller and Baruch Adiv.

The information session came following an International Renewable Energy Conference & Exhibition that was held in Eilat and run by the Eilat-Eilot Renewable Energy Administration, which is setting up the centre. The conference was run with support from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, UIA Federations Canada and organizations including the Israel Energy Forum and the Israeli Clean Energy Alliance.

Israel is known for its work in environmental technology, Levy said.

"Israel has a lot to offer, especially in the area of solar energy. We have technologies in wind, we have geothermal technology that's quite successful."

According to Levy, the Eilat-Eilot Renewable Energy Technological Center will create an international hub of technology in Eilat.

"When you have such a centre, there are cross-benefits," he said. "The fact that you have brilliant people sitting side by side, that is what the centre aspires to be – one of the global centres for alternative energy."

Levy added that the time is right for a centre committed to renewable energy.

"I think, overall in the world, there's an understanding that there's a need to move from fossil fuels and develop new sources of energy," he said.

Howard English, the vice-president of corporate communications for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, agrees.

"Research into renewable energy means independence in many ways for many developed countries that are so heavily reliant on oil right now," he said.

While the federation isn't supporting the centre financially, it's spreading awareness, English said, adding that investing in the centre is a natural step for Canadian companies.

"Canada has in every way a long and warm association with Israel on a research level and on a trading level," he said.

This is a chance for Israel to spread its knowledge worldwide, he added.

"Israel has a lot to teach international companies about renewable energy," English said. "I guess it's an opportunity for Israel to share with the world and to participate in projects."

For more information on the centre, contact Keren.Segal@CanadaIsraelChamber.com.

1925-2010

Sam Ross' commitment to Baycrest was deep and longstanding. A former member of the Baycrest Board of Directors, Sam served as chair of the Building Committee for the Terraces of Baycrest and the Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Centre.

In 1976, he was honoured as Man of the Year by the Men's Service Group and in 2003 was appointed an Honorary Director of Baycrest. In 2004, Sam was among the inaugural inductees of the Treasures of Baycrest.

A leadership gift from Sam and his beloved late wife Ida in 2005 enabled Baycrest to establish the unique Sam and Ida Ross Memory Clinic as part of its focus on brain health.

He will be remembered as a true friend of Baycrest. "Sam is a man of conscience who's always deeply concerned with the rights of individuals and the well-being of the community," former Baycrest CEO Sam Ruth once said. "He's a true gentleman."

Baycrest's sincere condolences go out to the entire Ross Family. May his memory be for a blessing.

A tribute to Israel's rescue team

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Under the motto, "Saving those who can be saved, honouring those who cannot," Zaka, Israel's volunteer emergency response organization, has quietly and quickly established its international credentials as a unique organization, respected and recognized around the world.

Born in 1995, the product of a macabre combination and outright contradiction – on the one hand, terrorist bombings; on the other, Judaism's stance on the dignity of the human form. Nothing could be further from respect of our humanity than those indiscriminate bombings. The result was not only the numerous casualties that ensued, but also the task of collection, identification and burial of organs, flesh and bones, and, indeed, every retrievable body part. After each of these unspeakable assaults against human dignity, volunteers would be seen, plastic bags in hand, at this gruesome task.

Today Zaka boasts 1,500 trained volunteers, 34 vehicles and 162 specially equipped motorcycles, all ready to deploy at a minute's notice 24/7.

Zaka is involved in every sort of emergency response, including fire, first aid, search and rescue. There are canine units, rappelling units, and recently, a unit of divers.

Because its volunteer efforts have been seen worldwide, Zaka, a non-governmental organization, was recognized by the United Nations in 2005 as a national humanitarian organization.

Anywhere there's a crisis, natural disaster or accident, its trained and highly motivated volunteers are dispatched immediately to lend a hand. These have included the tsunami in Thailand, Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans, the Columbia Space Shuttle crash site and terrorist attacks in Turkey and Mumbai.

In last month's devastating disaster, Haiti's earthquake claimed nearly a quarter of a million casualties, countless others were left homeless and handicapped, a country's infrastructure was destroyed, and its remains lay deep under rubble. Among the first international efforts was that of Zaka.

Tragically, a group of Zaka volunteers was on location at the time in Mexico City responding to the helicopter crash of community leader, builder, teacher and philanthropist Moise Saba, his wife, son and daughter-in-law. The Saba family had just returned from a simchah. Because of of security concerns resulting from Mexico's infamous kidnappings, they boarded the family's helicopter for the short flight from the airport to their home – a trip interrupted by a freak accident that killed all four passengers and the pilot. Moise Saba, was also part of Zaka's International Presidium and had recently allocated substantial funds of his own for Zaka to train and establish a Mexican branch.

An Israeli Zaka team was dispatched to the crash scene. As the world was still reeling with word of the loss of one of its finest families, news of the Haiti disaster broke. The team in Mexico was able to immediately co-ordinate with the Mexican Jewish community for planes to airlift them to Haiti with their massive tonnage of first-aid supplies.

The rescuers were assigned to a set of collapsed buildings on the University of Port au Prince campus. Work continued night and day and throughout Shabbat – lives were literally at stake.

The sight of visibly Jewish men heroically and selflessly at work was picked up and broadcast by the international media. Particularly poignant was the scene where the men led the Haitians in the singing of Hevaynu Shalom Alaichem – We have brought you peace.

A more incongruous a sight would be hard to find. A small, beleaguered state far, far away, Israel, bringing relief, peace and a sense of humanity to Haiti, a people not particularly renown as champions of human rights.

A vegetarian Passover

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

For many people, a seder meal wouldn't be right without a hard-boiled egg, a steaming bowl of chicken soup and a nice piece of brisket. But vegetarians prefer to celebrate the festival in a meatless manner.

According to Richard Schwartz, vegetarianism and Passover share a special relationship. "Just as we were strangers in Egypt and freed from our slavery, animals need to be freed from their slavery, suffering, torture and untimely death, in order to feed the whole world with the spirit of compassion, love, life and liberation. Meat begins with violence; meals don't have to! Vegetarianism offers compassion, respects the stranger, reduces suffering, and saves lives every day." [bit.ly/psch1]

Rabbi Benjamin Blech, a professor of Talmud at Yeshiva University, disagrees. He says the idea that all of God's creatures have the same right to live out their years is "a noble thought, ethically motivated, and yet – supremely un-Jewish!... Jews do eat meat. In fact, the Talmud teaches, that's what transforms an ordinary meal into a Sabbath or holiday feast... Animals, says the Midrash, were created before Adam so that they would be available for his table, just as a king prepares food in advance for his most favoured guest." [bit.ly/ psch32]

Let's just set that debate aside and focus on some recipes. At JewishVeg.com, there are classics such as Matzah Balls, Tzimmes, Vegetarian "Chicken" Soup and Strawberry Rhubarb Compote. And for something different, try Brazen Raisin Pesach Stew with Baked Sweet Potatoes, Sesame Baked Eggplant and Dried Plum Butter. [bit.ly/psch33] At Vegetarian Fat-Free Passover Recipes, you'll find out how to make healthy Brownies, Cabbage Soufflé Pudding and English Trifle. [bit.ly/ psch36]

Rather than suggest assorted vegetarian dishes, the VegSource site goes one better and recommends complete Ashkenazi and Sephardi seder menus. Sephardim can enjoy Date Charoset, Lemony Leek and Mushroom Soup and Sabbath Rice Pilaf with Saffron. Ashkenazim can go with Mock Chopped Liver, Charoset and Mushroom Matzo Farfel Pie. [bit.ly/ psch35] (Please note that one of the Ashkenazi recipes calls for string beans. Traditionally, Ashkenazim refrain from eating beans, legumes and rice on Passover.)

This doesn't mean a couple of days into the holiday you'll want to eat another piece of matzah. That's why the appearance of quinoa has been so significant. It's not very often that a new kosher for Passover food appears in the supermarket, let alone one that is actually good for you, too (high protein, good source of dietary fibre and high in magnesium and iron). Although quinoa may look like a grain, it's actually a member of the goosefoot family and is related to beets, spinach and tumbleweeds (yum). Before the rabbis agreed to certify its acceptability, they applied ancient Halachah and modern tests to make sure it's kosher for Pesach. It is. But as with any food, care must be taken that no chametz grains are mixed in. [bit.ly/psch6] Search jewishfood-list.com and you'll find recipes for Quinoa Tabouli and Quinoa Vegetable Soup. [bit.ly/psch7]

Now that we have decided what to eat, let's go back to the beginning – how do you set out a vegetarian seder plate? Maror (bitter herbs such as horseradish), karpas (vegetable such as celery), chazeret (bitter vegetable such as romaine lettuce) and charoset (apple, nut, spice and wine mixture) pose no issues to herbivores or omnivores. But then there is the question of that shank bone and roasted egg. Vegans may wish to swap the egg for olives and grapes, or a beet and avocado seed. As for the shank bone, which symbolizes the sacrificial lamb, Elizabeth Bauchner's family uses a long, skinny yam. "My mother-in-law says that we replace the Pascal Lamb with the Pascal Yam." [bit.ly/psch38]

Next week, Passover and food allergies.

Student advocates for Israel on campus

Stacey Bocknek is a University of Ottawa student and an Emerson Fellow.

She took some time out of her busy schedule to discuss the fellowship with The CJN. "The Emerson Fellowship is the fellowship for North Americans sponsored by the American organization Stand With Us. It deals with Israel advocacy," she said.

On Campus
By Justin Dahan

"Basically, they choose leaders across North America who have demonstrated their ability to advocate actively for Israel. Throughout the year, the Emerson Fellows organize events, bring speakers, and just hold events to advocate for Israel."

Bocknek has worked tirelessly to promote Israel on both the University of Ottawa and Carleton University campuses.

She arranged for Egyptian American Nonie Darwish, the founder of the group Arabs for Israel, to speak on campus. Darwish's father was an Egyptian soldier who was killed by Israelis. Darwish spoke about how she blamed Israel when she was a child, until she realized why exactly it had happened.

She is an interesting speaker and provides information that many Jewish students, who obviously do not share a similar upbringing, may not be aware of.

Another speaker – Israeli-Arab journalist Khaled Abu Toameh – is primed to take the students by storm. Toameh writes for the Jerusalem Post and is known to be an Israel supporter. Bocknek said that Toameh wrote for the Palestine Liberation Organization but left because he wasn't allowed to write what he wanted to write. He prefers to write for Israeli papers because there is no censorship.

"He tells it like it is and has done extensive work in the West Bank and Gaza. He is very pro-Israel, so it is refreshing to see his perspective as an Arab who is living in Israel," Bocknek said.

By bringing in speakers such as Darwish and Toameh, Bocknek is doing an excellent job of providing students with information about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Bocknek will be presenting a book reading in Ottawa. Light Behind the Darkness is a collection of short stories that was co-written by two men from Ottawa: Claude Weil, an Israeli, and Raouf Omar, a Palestinian. They met in Ottawa and developed a friendship.

The book is made up of short stories about random acts of kindness from both sides. "I think this is important, because you usually don't hear any good stories coming from the Israeli-Palestinian conflict," Bocknek said. "I think a lot of Jews are looking for something that promotes peace and is a little more forward-thinking."

Bocknek's presentations have some major themes in common. Two of the them, and the most obvious, are pro-Israel sentiment and pro-peace sentiment.

What I find the most impressive is that Bocknek has managed to put on multiple events focusing on important topics that many Jewish students discuss and read about daily in various sources. These events enlighten the students who attend, as well as provide them with new information.

Truly, Bocknek is doing an excellent job as an Emerson Fellow and has yet to show any signs of slowing down.

Safeguarding freedom of speech

Freedom of speech is not something to be taken lightly. In the last few weeks, my inbox has been flooded with e-mails urging me to watch the YouTube video of Israeli Ambassador Michael Oren speaking at the University of California, Irvine. The video, titled Uncivilized Tactics, has gone viral, with nearly a half a million views in just a few weeks.

The video depicts a cycle repeated 10 times during Oren's speech. First, a pro-Palestinian supporter stands up, to great applause shouts an undecipherable pejorative and is escorted from the room by security. Next, a university official calls for decorum and chastises the protesters. Finally, Oren, in a calm voice, continues his speech. In all, 11 students were arrested.

Class Act
By Daniel Held

The e-mails have unanimously decried the protesters' attempts to strip Oren of his right to free speech. They are correct. Oren has a right both to share his personal opinion and to publicly offer the State of Israel's position. This right was threatened by the protesters and defended by the university official and security personnel. In the same e-mail, however, some have called for protesters to shut down Israeli Apartheid Week, which will hit Canadian campuses in the coming days. One explicitly urged adopting the tactics of the Irvine protesters to shut down controversial speeches.

While there is no doubt that Israeli Apartheid Week spews propaganda and lies, adopting the tactics of the Irvine protesters would deny the rights of free expression. Rights that we, as Jews, should hold especially dear.

I began my university career a few short weeks after the Durban debacle equated Zionism with Racism and Israel with apartheid. The second intifadah was in full swing, and Palestinian supporters were emboldened by the United Nations' tacit condemnation of Israel. I had just returned from a year of study in Israel and quickly realized that my academic pursuits would be overshadowed by advocacy efforts.

I was involved in postering and letter-writing campaigns, raucous debates and endless advocacy training. Under the aegis of Hillel, I invited controversial speakers to campus who sparked protests. We, in turn, protested pro-Palestinian speakers. I wrote op-eds and letters to the editor, became involved in campus politics and rallied my peers. While I was an advocate for liberalism and tolerance, I believe that many of our actions escalated tensions on campus. In retrospect, I believe that our tactics are partially responsible for the current hostilities on campus.

The secret to campus activism, which I learned only after finishing my undergrad, is that the vast majority of students on campus don't care about Israel or Palestine – they just want to go to their classes, write their papers and graduate. The yelling and screaming across the hallway, the protest and shouts of outrage, and the increased police presence on campus only serve to further alienate the silent majority of ambivalent students who find the conflict more of a nuisance than a debate of ideas. By engaging with the devout pro-Palestinian students, I was not only wasting my own efforts, but also ostracizing those who should have been my real audience – those who just want to go to class. Only softer tones and cooler heads can convince the silent majority.

Michael Oren is the star of the UC Irvine video. He remained calm and collected. With each outburst, he took a step away from the microphone and waited for decorum. He refused to engage with the protesters, and instead ensured that his speech was delivered and his right to speak upheld. Few will remember the content of Oren's speech; many will remember his right to speak.

As Israeli Apartheid Week approaches, student leaders are challenged to follow Oren's example and find tactics that will at once safeguard freedom of speech – even of those whose ideas are anathema to our own – and at the same time speak to the silent majority.

Comedy film festival founder filled a niche

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Toronto's annual World of Comedy Film Festival, which gets under way this week, is a reality thanks to Carla Nolan.

Nolan, whose Russian-born grandfather Israel Miller performed in Yiddish theatre in Edmonton, founded the festival in 2003 to fill a yawning need.

"At that point in my life, I realized that what I needed was more laughter," she said. "So I thought, 'Why not start a comedy film festival?'"

After doing research, she discovered that there were only two such festivals in the world, including one in Montreal, the Just for Laughs Film Festival.

"I realized there was a niche to be filled," said Nolan, a graduate of the University of Alberta who majored in theatre.

By that juncture, Nolan had been an in-house producer at YTV, the children's television channel, for about a decade and thought it was time for a change.

In launching the festival, she faced such difficulties as financing and public awareness.

Nolan, who had been an administrator in the Alberta government's performing arts branch and one of the founders of the first women's film and video co-operative in Edmonton, garnered support from colleagues and friends.

"The first year was more successful than I hoped it would be. We received great media coverage and filmmakers came in from as far away as Australia," she recalled. "We screened 70 shorts and features. Even a horrible snowstorm didn't stop audiences from attending."

Carla Nolan

This year's festival, which runs from March 5-7 at the Innis Town Hall Theatre, showcases 59 shorts and feature films from Canada and the United States and from an assortment of countries ranging from Norway to France.

One of the offerings, Mendel's Tree, is a zany, surreal and improbable seven-minute short about a haredi Jew who frantically tries to dispose of a Christmas tree in his living room after learning that his mother is coming to visit him. It hails from Australia and is directed by Fin Edquist.

Realizing that comedy is a very subjective genre, Nolan, the festival's director, always tries to create a lineup that appeals to different tastes.

"I think that's why our programs of shorts are so popular," she explained.

If you don't like one, you may like another. "Our films cover the whole gamut of the genre, from romantic comedies and slapstick to mockumentaries and political satire."

Asked whether she has a special affinity for comedy, given her Jewish background, she replied, "Jews love joy. They love to tell stories and laugh. Our humour became a coping mechanism to help us survive difficult times."

Nolan, whose father was a pharmacist and whose mother was a piano teacher, was influenced by her parents, who were both interested in theatre, music and visual arts.

While attending Talmud Torah, she performed in Chanukah and Purim plays. And in high school, she joined the drama club.

"I became immersed in Edmonton's vibrant theatre scene, acting, directing and producing and directing children's theatre classes at the Jewish community centre."

After moving to Toronto, Nolan joined YTV, working on Gemini-nominated programs. Seguing into filmmaking, she produced two shorts, The Red Clog and Roy, which were broadcast on various networks and cable stations.

More recently, she was part of the development team for the Canadian Film Channel, a proposed national specialty TV service.

German, Polish consuls praise Shoah education

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Historical memory in the service of combating anti-Semitism and fostering dialogue in the wake of the Holocaust was the theme of a panel discussion at the consulate of Poland late last month.

The event, co-sponsored by the German consulate in Toronto, was part of this year's Mark and Gail Appel program in Holocaust and anti-racism education, "Learning from the Past, Teaching for the Future."

The program, an initiative of the Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies and the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies at York University, explored the topic of "Cultures of Memory in Canada, Germany and Poland."

In the audience were, among others, 32 Canadian, German and Polish university students selected to take part in the program and expected to forge careers in education and journalism in their respective countries.

They arrived in Toronto on Feb. 11 and left Canada on Feb. 21 after attending seminars, lectures and workshops, visiting a synagogue, churches and Islamic and Chinese community centres and going to Niagara Falls and a resort in Muskoka.

The Polish consul general in Toronto, Marek Ciesielczuk, kicked off the proceedings by recalling the "culture of mutual inspiration and enrichment" in pre-World War II Poland – which was home to 3.3 million Jews – and by stating that the Holocaust should not be treated as "an incidental incident."

Sabine Sparwasser

Observing that the participation of Polish students in the program was rendered possible by the 1989 democratic revolution in Poland, he said they would plant "the seeds of truth and reconciliation" in the battle against xenophobia, racism and anti-Semitism.

Sabine Sparwasser, Germany's consul general, said, "The Holocaust was an event of unparalleled evil. To know that the crimes were committed by one's own fellow citizens has been a terrible burden to bear, not just for Germans of the wartime generation, but for all succeeding generations as well."

Praising German university students of the late 1960s for raising painful issues and thereby changing the way Germans relate to their past, she said the study of the Holocaust has become "a central feature of school curricula and university research" and a focus of the mass media.

Lorna Wright, York University's associate vice-president of international affairs, described the program as "one of the most successful and innovative" in terms of its global reach.

Bartosz Wisniewski, who studies modern languages, literature and Hebrew at Adam Mickiewicz University in Poznan, Poland, spoke for his fellow students. In an apparent reference to Nazi concentration camps, he said, "We were in places that shouldn't have existed."

Calling the program "a wonderful experience" whose lesson is tolerance, he said it gives young Poles like himself the strength to deal with the future.

Michael Brown, former director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, said the culture of memory should be no less important in Canada than in Europe, given Canada's shameful record in admitting Jewish refugees in the 1930s and 1940s.

Brown said None Is Too Many – a path-breaking book by Irving Abella and Harold Troper published in the 1980s about Canada's former immigration policy – left a deep impression on Canadians.

"We can see that education helps, and that's a good lesson for us," he noted.

Peter Trummer, a Heidelberg University historian specializing in German history, genocide and remembrance and a recruiter of students to the program, said that Germany has a well-established culture of memory in the form of memorial sites and monuments and school curricula.

But in the last decade, in a new development, various "victim groups" have begun competing for government funds, he said. Among them are Jews who were persecuted during the Nazi era and Germans who were displaced after World War II and suffered under communism in the former East Germany.

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The owners of the property housing Cinéma du Parc withdrew their demand that the cinema remove an exhibition of photos taken in Gaza, apparently mostly in the aftermath of Israel's military offensive over December 2008 and January 2009.

The exhibition, which is described by the Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC) as "offensive, manipulative and dishonest," is now slated to tour across Canada.

The exhibition's organizer, Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East (CJPME), said Feb. 22 that the cinema had received an e-mail from Lieba Shell, the legal representative for the landlord Gestion Redbourne PDP Inc., that the exhibition could continue until its scheduled closing Feb. 28.

The exhibition, entitled "Human Drama in Gaza," consists of 44 large-scale photos said to been taken before, during and after the 22-day conflict between Israel and Hamas by professional photographers from Israel, the Palestinian territories and western countries.

It opened Jan. 15, and partly coincided with the independent cinema's screening of the French-Israeli documentary Rachel, about the 2003 death of young American activist Rachel Corrie while protesting the Israeli army's presence in Gaza.

The exhibition was open for a month before Redbourne demanded that it be taken down immediately, under penalty of legal action. The order cited a clause in the lease with the cinema that the space is for "purely cinemagraphic use."

The owners were apparently responding to complaints from the public that the exhibition was anti-Israel. The cinema is located in the Place du Parc shopping centre on Park Avenue, and the exhibition was viewable without having to be a client of the cinema.

CPJME's lawyer Mark Arnold countered that a photo exhibition did constitute such use, and that another clause in the lease states that the tenant may host "presentations, meetings, viewings or other similar activities."

The cinema, which is owned by Roland Smith, also pointed out that it had hosted almost 40 other photo exhibitions, some related to social or political issues, over the years, without complaint from Redbourne. Most of the photos depict everyday life in Gaza amid the destruction after the conflict. Some are disturbing: one, for example, is of a child's burial and many are of people suffering.

CPJME spokesperson Grace Batchoun said the organization bought the rights to the photos from the news agencies Reuters, Agence France-Presse and Getty Images.

This was the Canadian première of the exhibition, and CJPME plans to show it next in Ottawa at a venue being finalized, she said. The intention is to continue the tour in Toronto, London and the west. QIC executive director Lucian del Negro said that, while the QIC finds the exhibition morally reprehensible, it does not believe it crosses any legal lines and therefore did not make any objection.

Rejectionism, not settlements, is why conflict lingers

In his Feb. 19 Globe and Mail opinion piece, "The latest U.S. Mideast position: lots of noise signifying nothing," Michael Bell argued the following points, which express a widely held view in the West about the current diplomatic impasse in Israeli-Palestinian affairs:

• The Americans have abandoned their previous demand that Israel halt all settlement activity, much to the delight of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

• The Palestinians, having demanded an end to all housing construction as their condition for a return to negotiations, therefore, feel dejected.

• Only sustained U.S. pressure on Israel short of threatening the stability of his coalition, including cutbacks on diplomacy and loan guarantees, might induce Israel to be more pliant toward the Palestinians.

Although Bell framed the third point as the expression of "frustrated policy wonks" one might fairly assume that Bell counts himself among them, especially since nowhere else in his article does he mention any factor other than settlements as an issue impairing the resumption of negotiations.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Bell omitted to mention that Netanyahu did what no previous Israeli prime minister – including Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres, Ehud Barak and Ehud Olmert – has done: he ordered a 10-month moratorium on settlement activity in the West Bank (he excluded housing activity in east Jerusalem, which the majority of Israelis view differently). But such is the cynicism about Netanyahu in many western circles that even this step can be simply overlooked as insignificant.

What also underlies the cynicism is the assumption that if only Israel would cease all settlement activity, the peace process would unfold in a way the Palestinians are anxious to see. This assumption is as false and misleading as it is pervasive.

We must recall that former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat negotiated with Israel (1994-2001) during the Oslo process, despite the fact that Oslo did not bar settlement activity, yet some progress was made in negotiations (Israel relinquished land to the Palestinians) until Arafat rejected Barak's offer of Palestinian statehood. His rejection was not over settlements – a complicated but resolvable issue.

Arafat's successor, Mahmoud Abbas, negotiated with former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert during the Annapolis talks (2006-08) under the same conditions (of settlement activity). While Olmert's offer of Palestinian statehood was reportedly even more generous than what Barak had offered to Arafat, Abbas, too, spurned the historic chance for statehood. Like Arafat, Abbas arguably could not put an end to the conflict by accepting the legitimacy of Jewish sovereignty and giving up the "right of return" of Palestinians to Israel. These principles, not settlements, are the core issues on which the Palestinians have refused to compromise. And this refusal to compromise is why the conflict lingers.

Journalists and pundits who write constantly only about settlements but who ignore or sidestep the deeper, seemingly intractable problems are telling just one part of the story, and not even its most vital part. Yet their preoccupation plays into the reigning narrative that views Palestinians as helpless victims of Israeli greed and triumphalism.

In a news story in the Globe just days before Bell's piece appeared, GLORIA Center head Barry Rubin was cited as saying that U.S. President Barack Obama has adopted former president George W. Bush's policy, one he previously ridiculed. The context was that, to the delight of Netanhayu's officials, Abbas is being squeezed to return to a form of negotiations by having to accept less than a total settlement freeze which Obama previously promoted.

What was not reported, however, is Rubin's central argument: that there can be no genuine peace process, because the Fatah leadership "is still radical, more eager to reconcile with Hamas than to make peace with Israel. T[heir] world view is extremist and geared toward total victory. PA media and clerics encourage violence and teach that Israel is temporary and illegitimate" ("Quick, look busy!" Jerusalem Post, Feb. 14).

Unless and until that attitude changes, no Israeli-Palestinian agreement will be possible. And until assorted experts and reporters pay attention to this attitude, western understanding about what's at issue will remain severely constricted.

Two men arrested in N.S. cross-burning incident

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — The RCMP made a quick arrest and charged two men with public incitement of hatred, mischief and uttering threats in connection with a cross- burning incident in Nova Scotia on Feb. 21.

Shayne Howe and Michelle Lyon, a married interracial couple, were the victims of the heinous crime, which horrified people across Canada and evoked condemnation from Jewish groups as well.

The two men, ages 20 and 19, both from Avondale, in Hants County, are alleged to have placed a large wooden cross on the front lawn of the couple's home in Poplar Grove, near Avondale, and lit it on fire, reminiscent of Ku Klux Klan racial hatred in the southern United States.

Before leaving, while the cross burned, one man yelled, "Die nigger die."

RCMP spokesperson Sgt. Bridgit Leger said the two accused and the victims are known to each other, and the incident was not a random act of violence.

Jon Goldberg, executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC), decried the incident. "I hope this is just two people being jerks and doing something on their own, and not a resuscitation of events that happened 20 years ago" when, prior to the advent of the Internet and e-mail, hate messages were sent to the AJC and others via fax.

In a statement issued by Canadian Jewish Congress and the AJC a day before the arrests were made, Goldberg said, "We urge the RCMP to investigate this intolerable incident with a view to pursuing the potential hate crime dimension of any criminal charges that may be laid."

Howe, concerned for the safety of his wife and five children, aged two to 17, was thinking of moving if the perpetrators were not caught. He expressed gratitude for the overwhelming support he received from friends, neighbours and others. A Facebook site generated almost 1,700 members expressing their outrage over the incident.

"People I don't know are offering their support," Howe, who is black, said before the arrests. "They have pulled together to make us feel so welcome. Staying or leaving is completely dependent on the capture of the individuals.

"If those who did this remain at large, we'd leave. If they're caught, I'd stay. And everyone is telling us not to leave."

Winnipeg student on gold medal debating team

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — While all eyes were focused on the Winter Olympics in Vancouver last month, another Canadian team was winning a gold medal in a venue about as far away from snow as you can get.

In Doha, Qatar, a team of Canadian high school students won the gold medal at the World Schools Debating Championship. This was Canada's first gold since a Canadian team won the inaugural competition in 1988.

One of the members of the winning team is the Winnipeg Jewish community's Sarah Levy.

The daughter of Moe Levy, the executive director of the Asper Foundation, was the only Winnipegger to make the team as well as the only Jewish member of the team. The other eight team members, she notes, included three students each from Halifax and Vancouver and two from Calgary.

Levy is a Grade 11 student at St. John's-Ravenscourt School, a prestigious private school. She enrolled in Ravenscourt last September after attending the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education's Gray Academy to the end of Grade 10.

The star debater began to debate through the Gray Academy's debating program when she was in Grade 7. Last December, she finished in the top 10 in individual debating in the annual Asper Cup International High School Debates in Winnipeg. She and her partner were also finalists in the pairs competition.

She has previously debated internationally in England and Scotland.

Levy notes that the selection process for the all-Canada debating team begins at the provincial level. The top three debaters from each province compete for the nine spots on the team. The decision is made based on participation in debate tournaments as well as through an interview process and debate resumes. The team members are chosen 14 months ahead of the world championships.

"There was a lot of training and studying involved," Levy notes. "We had online assignments. We had papers to prepare. We had to read a lot of books and follow the news. And we did tune-up debates and practice rounds every so often in different cities."

Sarah Levy

The world tournament took place in Doha from Feb. 8 to 18.

"It was amazing to see so many debaters from so many countries," Levy says. "There were almost 60 countries represented, 10 times as many as in 1988 when the first world tournament was held."

Among the toughest competitors, Levy says, were teams from England, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Singapore and Pakistan. The Israeli team finished in 15th place.

In the finals, Levy's team was up against the team from England. In that debate, the Canadian team had to defend a resolution that big companies should never receive government bailouts. The Canadian debaters won by an 8-3 score.

Levy has nothing but praise for the tournament's Qatari hosts. "The royal family funded the tournament," she says. "I had a very positive impression of the Qatari people. Everyone treated us very well. They seemed grateful that we were there."

Since her return from Qatar, Levy has participated in a debate in Winnipeg and is looking forward to the national tournament in Victoria in April. She already knows that she will be representing Canada again at the next world championship, which is scheduled for August 2011 in Dundee, Scotland. After finishing high school, she is planning to enrol in arts at McGill University, with the ultimate goal of earning a law degree.

PLEASE HELP US HONOUR ONTARIO HOLOCAUST SURVIVORS

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem is seeking nominations for Ontario Holocaust Survivors
To be Honoured by Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty
For their Outstanding Achievements and Contributions to the Province of Ontario

MONDAY, APRIL 26TH, 2010 - 11:00 AM

In the last decade, hundreds of Holocaust survivors have been recognized by the Premier of Ontario in conjunction with the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem for their remarkable achievements in rebuilding their lives and bettering our society. Survivors have shown remarkable courage and resilience in building new families and contributing to Ontario's family life, culture, business, community affairs and /or politics. Survivors have also demonstrated a commitment to Holocaust Education and Remembrance (Zachor), educating and passing the torch of Holocaust Remembrance to future generations.

Please send all recommendations, including name, background of survivor & full contact information to:

Obituary

Ken Narvey had passion for war crimes dossier

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

With his rumpled suit, frayed pants and dishevelled appearance, Ken Narvey always looked like someone who had just woken up at his desk after an all-nighter researching some arcane point of law.

A freelance legal researcher with a passion for the Nazi war crimes dossier, Narvey died recently in his hometown of Winnipeg from a heart attack. He was 66.

A self-trained legal researcher who never completed law school, Narvey nevertheless was one of the most well-informed experts on war crimes and bringing Nazi war criminals to justice. It's a subject he had been researching for nearly 25 years. Over the course of his career, he gained intervener status in various cases involving war crimes on behalf of student groups and the Coalition of Concerned Congregations, a Montreal organization.

He had a passion for the law, and in the early years of his research he was part of a group of advocates who insisted there was nothing to prevent a Canadian legal solution to bring Nazi war criminals to justice. This view was at odds with the accepted wisdom that little could be done domestically regarding foreign crimes committed many years before.

Lawyer David Matas, who remembers Narvey from their days as undergraduates at the University of Manitoba, said Narvey played a significant role during the discussion leading to adoption of the Charter of Rights. Narvey's research helped ensure the Charter contained a provision that would not preclude retroactive prosecution for war crimes and crimes against humanity.

Winnipeg lawyer Gerry Posner said that "Ken flew under the radar. I suspect most people didn't know about him. But his research was as good as any lawyer. He was so bright."

"This was a guy with his idiosyncrasies, but if you knew anything about him you'd know how brilliant he was," said Posner, the executor of Narvey's estate.

Narvey grew up in Winnipeg, but lived much of his life in Montreal. He graduated from the University of Manitoba with a degree in arts. He received a Rhodes Scholarship and travelled to Cambridge to study economics. Narvey also studied at MIT, but never completed a degree and left U of M law school after a week or two, his sister, Janice Afruma, said.

Matas said before turning his attention to the war crimes file, Narvey had been researching the legal aspects of the flooding of Indian lands in Quebec.

Narvey joined him and law professor Irwin Cotler in studying the war crimes issue in the late 1970s, Matas said. They researched the legal basis for an intervention application in the extradition case of Helmut Rauca, an SS sergeant wanted in Germany for murdering 11,584 Jews.

"Ken was always a freelance activist and researcher, but his focus was this issue. It kind of became his life's work," said Matas.

Narvey supported his research by fundraising within the Jewish community, he added.

Narvey, who suffered from diabetes for many years, is survived by his father Fred, sister Janice Afruma, niece Anya DeMontigny and her son Naryan Schindler, nephew Michael Afruma, his wife Katy and their daughter Ryan Elizabeth.

Obituary

She'arim supporter gave 'quietly, with dignity'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Sam Hennick, a Toronto businessman who will be remembered for his support of Jewish communal causes – most notably students with learning disabilities – died Feb. 19 of a heart attack. He was 78.

Sam Hennick

The son of Polish immigrants, Hennick was born in Toronto and attended Harbord Collegiate. He was "very much like his mother – strong-willed with a fierce sense of loyalty to family and friends, a peacemaker, always there when you needed him," his daughter, Ellen Turkienicz, said in a eulogy.

Hennick never complained about the state of his health in recent months, she said. He had undergone surgery for lung cancer, but remained strong and independent, his son Jay told The CJN last week.

Sam and his wife, Sara, who died 10 years ago, raised their four children with laughter, love, honesty, common sense and Jewish tradition, Turkienicz said. Married in 1956, they were "a team from the start."

The Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, Sara and Sam Hennick Education Centre – which closed in 2008 because of financial difficulties – was named in their honour. As well, Sam supported several special needs Hebrew schools and "countless" other causes, his daughter said. Among them were Baycrest, Mount Sinai Hospital and Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

He gave charity "quietly, with dignity, and without judgment," Turkienicz said.

Shortly before She'arim closed, Hennick told The CJN he had established a fund at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Jewish Foundation, the proceeds of which helped the school.

Hennick was in the jewelry manufacturing business for many years and co-founded First Service, a diversified real estate services company, with his son, Jay.

As a grandfather, Hennick had an individual bond with each of his 13 grandchildren, his grandson, Beryl Sitzer, said at the funeral. "He was a kid at heart."

Grandson Bradley Hennick, who also delivered a eulogy, said he had written in an application for an MBA program about how his grandfather inspired him.

His grandfather's example taught him that success is "the result of hard work, learning from failure, staying loyal to family and friends who have helped you along the way, and continuously striving to be a better person," he wrote.

As well, he said, Hennick's lessons to his grandchildren included the importance of kindness and the power of a positive attitude.

Rabbi Howard Morrison, in his eulogy, said that Hennick "was about modesty, about being humble."

Before She'arim moved to the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, She'arim was housed at Beth Emeth, where Rabbi Morrison is spiritual leader – and where the Hennicks were early members under the spiritual leadership of Rabbi Joseph Kelman, a founder of the school.

Hennick is survived by his children Jay Hennick, Resa Sitzer, Ellen Turkienicz and Adam Hennick; 13 grandchildren; one great-grandchild, and siblings Harry, Nathan, Frances Kleinberg, and Ethel Pasternak. His brother, Irving, predeceased him.

On Campus

Website features Israel's club scene

The campaign's website also features pictures from Israel's club scene and areas such as Mount Tabor, in Lower Galilee.

"Students were not satisfied with the way Israel was represented on campus. We took it into our hands to show the Israel that we know. It's a different way of looking at Israel," said Cherniak, explaining that, in the past, there were two types of awareness campaigns: soft-core campaigns that featured Israel and the West's "shared values and falafels" and advocacy campaigns that responded to anti-Israel sentiments.

"The hard-core advocacy looks reactive. And it is, because you have to respond to lies," Cherniak said. "The soft-core campaign looks irrelevant."

The Size Doesn't Matter campaign aims to combine the two in a light, but thought-provoking way.

The campaign is directed at apathetic students who know little about Israel, Cherniak said.

"This is for the 80 per cent [of students] in the middle, not for students who love Israel or hate Israel, but for the students who can't even point out Israel on the map," she said.

The website, www.sizedoesntmatter.ca, contains facts about Israel, as well as a list of various pro-Israel speakers and events at universities across Canada. Its tagline is "Israel. Small country. Big appetite for peace."

The campaign's final phase is its speaker series, which delves into topics such as obstacles to peace in the Middle East and minority groups in Israel.

"The speaker series goes a little further. We move [from] the most superficial to the deepest ideas," she said.

So far, the campaign's video has had about 25,000 views and the website has had around 12,000 hits.

For Deborah Mechanic, a third-year kinesiology student at York University, the video is definitely attention-catching.

"I saw it on Facebook first and was surprised that it was so in your face. The Israel campaigns before weren't that out there," Mechanic said. "Even the colours are pretty extreme. It strays from the usual blue and white, and it kind of brings people in to find out more."

Mechanic sees the campaign as a good way to learn about Israel.

"It's great for drawing people in to find out more about it… It's pro-Israel, but it's not overwhelming with the blue and white, and it's edgy enough that if someone takes a card or button, they might actually go to the website," she said, adding that the campaign was launched at a good time.

גידי קורן וחברים

אבל הסיפור הגדול ביותר שהמחיש לי את כוחם של משחקי ונקובר לזהות הלאומית הקנדית הוא זה של ג'יאני רוסט. שלושה ימים למני השתתפותה בתחרות ההחלקה האמנותית מגיעה אמה לונקובר ומתמוטטת בגמל התעופה מהתקף לב ולרופאים לא נותר אלא לקבוע את מותה. ג'יאני ממשיכה להתאמן וזוקדת נפלא ביום התחרות הראשון. אך בסיום הריקוד מורצת הנערה היפה מקוויבק בבכי קורע לב, וכדברי השדרן בטלביזיה- באותו רגע בכו עשרים מליון קנדים מול המסך הקטן. הרגשת הזהות היתה רבת עוצמה מאין כמותה.
ומנגד היה הקטע השראלי. ישראל יוצגה על ידי אח ואחות ממוצא רוסי שביצעו החלקה אמנותית מרשימה שזיכתה אותם במקום העשירי המכובד. אלא מה- הם בחרו להחליק לצלילי השיר "הבה נגילה", כשאת השיר מבצעת זמרת במבטא רוסי כבד ששיבשה את המילים, כדרכם של זמרים שאין להם מושג מה הם שרים. לכאורה- ממש לא חשוב, אבל בעיני זה היה מאוד סימבולי לכך שצוות מחליקי הקרח הישראלים לא ייצג את החוויה הישראלית, אלא את אמא רוסיה. לכאורה אין בזה רע- א בל אולי מוטב שמדינה שאין בה חורף אמיתי לא תשתתף באולימפיאדת החורף.
אבל שישאר בינינו.

מעשה בסוסה

גבר חזר עייף מהעבודה ומתיישב מול הטלביזיה. ניגשת אשתו מאחוריו וחובטת בחוזקה בראשו עם מחבת גדול. כשהוא מתאושש הוא שואל אותה: על מה זה בדיוק היה!
עונה לו האשה: זה עבור הפתק שמצאתי בכיס שלך ועליו כתוב "מרי".
כועס האיש ועונה לה: אתמול הייתי במירוץ סוסים וקיבלתי טיפ על הסוסה מרי, ואכן היא זכתה!
מתנצלת האשה וחוזרת לעבודות הבית.
כעבור יומיים חוזר האיש מהעבודה, ובישובו מול הטלביזיה מגיעה אישתו עם מחבת כפול בגודלו ומורידה לו על הראש. האיש מאבד את הכרתו וכשהוא מתעורר מעלמוז הוא שואל אותה: מה הפעם!
עונה לו האשה:
הסוסה מרי צלצלה....

עונת האוסקר

אם אתם אוהבים להתרגש בזמן טקסי האוסקר מסרטים וכוכבים שאתם מכירים, הינה שני סרטי חובה שיש להם קו משותף:
The Blind Side מספר את סיפורה האמיתי של משפחה אמריקאית עשירה שאימצה ילד כושי מחונה שנחשב היה למפגר, והוא הופך לכוכב עוצר על בפוטבול האמריקאי בזכות משפחתו המאמצת. סנדרה בולוק עושה התפקיד נפלא שהעניק לה מועמדות לשחקנית השנה. שמונה בשולם קורן.
Precious הוא סיפורה הנוגע ללב ומזעזע של נערה שחורה מהארלם שהכל עובד נגדה, עד שהיא פוגשת אנשים שאכפת להם. סרט מושלם, עשר בשלם קורן, אבל שישאר בינינו.

Yiddish not a dying language, professors say

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Anna Shternshis doesn't see Yiddish as an ancient language. She sees it as a link to her heritage.

"If a language dies, it's the death of a civilization," said Shternshis, who was born in Russia and is an assistant professor of Yiddish and transnational and diasporic studies at the University of Toronto, and the associate director of the university's Centre for Jewish Studies.

"It's not just about vocabulary, it's a whole culture… It's important to keep it alive, and translation alone will not cut it. Yiddish provides access to wonderful literature [and] to a vibrant culture."

Shternshis hopes to prove that this week during a symposium devoted to Yiddish, which she helped to organize. The symposium, called "Ethnography, Culture and Oral History of Yiddish Speakers in Contemporary Eastern Europe," will include presentations from various researchers who have visited eastern European shtetls, or towns, where the language and Jewish culture has persevered.

"The idea was to highlight this very exciting research that is going on now on finding the last Yiddish speakers of the 20th century who never left eastern Europe," Shternshis said. "Most astonishingly, they all speak Yiddish. There are some places in Moldova and western Ukraine where you can still go and see people speaking Yiddish in the street."

Jeff Veidlinger has seen this first-hand. Veidlinger, the director of the Borns Jewish Studies Program at Indiana University, will speak at the symposium about his work on the Archives of Historical and Ethnographic Yiddish Memories oral history project, a collection of about 800 hours worth of Yiddish-language interviews.

The project, which was started in 2002, has taken Veidlinger and his fellow researchers to Ukraine, Moldova, Slovakia and Hungary.

"When I first went to the shtetl, I expected it to look like those old postcards. These are real places with real people," he said.

Most of the people that Veidlinger interviewed were born between 1900 and 1930 and knew very little about Jewish history, he said.

"Jewish religious practice was very difficult since the 1930s. Most of the people we interview know very little about Jewish religious practices or Jewish history, so their one link to their identity [is Yiddish]," he said.

Mikhail Krutikov, an assistant professor in Judaic and Slavic studies at the University of Michigan, has also done field work in eastern Europe. Through his research, Krutikov, who will be presenting at the symposium, learned that Yiddish is not a dying language, he said.

"There's this idea that Yiddish would be gone anyway with assimilation. Jews would just stop speaking Yiddish. What we observed there is that, even now… [Yiddish] still survived.

"Yiddish was able to maintain itself up to well into the 1990s… I think this disproves the point that Yiddish was dying."

Krutikov sees Yiddish as a way for Jews in the Diaspora to connect to one another.

"When I write in Yiddish, I can address people in Australia, New York, Poland," he said. "Each country is becoming more and more entrenched in its own culture. Yiddish is one of the few languages that is still transnational."

The symposium takes place on March 7 from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. at the U of T's Robert Gill Theatre. Psoy Korolenko, a singer and songwriter from Moscow, performs Virtual Nostalgia, Second Degree, a concert of Soviet popular hits and post-shtetl songs in Russian, Yiddish and Moldavian at 8 p.m. to mark the conclusion of the daylong symposium. For more information, contact anna.shternshis@utoronto.ca.

Show brings multiculturalism to campuses

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

What do you get when you throw a Jew, a Muslim, a Korean, a Jamaican and a Filipino on stage?

Comedy gold. And maybe a little cultural understanding.

At least, that was Alex Kojfman's goal when he started The Colours of Comedy standup show in 2007.

"I was performing at the old Laugh Resort [in Toronto] and there would be four comics on the bill, three of them were Jewish. We were all white-looking," Kojfman, a Jewish comedian, said.

"We're in Toronto, one of the most multicultural cities in the world... by creating The Colours of Comedy, I wanted to bring different comedians on stage with different ethnicities and backgrounds."

While there are comedy shows aimed at African-American or Jewish audiences, there weren't many shows that brought the groups together, Kojfman said.

"Sometimes people go to certain niche shows. Jewish audiences will go to a Jewish night. If you brought all these people together, we could mix everybody," he said. "You know what it's like?... It's that platter appetizer that has a bit of everything."

This year, Kojfman brought his show to York University on March 2 in partnership with the students involved with Parallels for Peace, a weeklong campaign that encourages peace in the Middle East, and Hillel.

The show is on at the University of Toronto on March 4, presented by Hillel, the Multi Faith Centre, the Muslim Students Association and the Pakistani Students Federation.

Kojfman's goal for his latest shows is for the audiences to reflect the diversity onstage.

"Laughter is the greatest tension breaker. You get Jews, you get Muslims, you get African-Americans, Catholics, the Irish, you get everybody in a room and it just completely disarms them," he said.

"I don't think my show will cure the Middle East conflict... [but] despite what [students] may think beforehand, if you disarm them with comedy, they can approach each other and say, 'That was really funny.'"

Kojfman's show, which includes comedians such as Zabrina Chevannes, Alex Faisal Butt, John Ki, Gilson Lubin and Ron Josol, is a chance for students of all backgrounds to socialize, he said.

"They're students. They want to laugh, they want to be social. That's where comedy comes in. I think that's what peace is all about," he said.

Nathaly Schneider, who is an organizer of the Parallels for Peace campaign at York, which started on March 1, agrees.

"It's a good idea to bring the community together and to embrace your culture," she said. "Everyone can laugh at themselves, it's a great way to break the tension on campus."

Ishraq Alim, the communications director of the Muslim Students Association at U of T, sees the show as a good way to embrace Toronto's multiculturalism.

"The thing is, we live in a multi-ethnic, multi-faith society. Sometimes, it's important for us to meet different communities on our campus," he said, adding that the show provides an opportunity for Jewish and Muslim students to relate to each other.

"Jews and Muslims love to laugh. I think comedy and laughter is something that's universal. Everyone likes a good joke," he said.

The Colours of Comedy show at U of T takes place at the Robert Gill Theatre, Koffler Centre, on March 4 at 7 p.m. Proceeds from the York U show went to the Red Cross, and proceeds from the U of T show will go to Doctors Without Borders.

Kojfman will also host a Colours of Comedy show on March 20 at the Great Hall in downtown Toronto. Doors open at 8 p.m., and tickets are $10 in advance, $15 at the door. For more information, visit www.coloursofcomedy.com.

Something to laugh about

Compiled by CJN Staff

Whoever coined the adage – "laughter is the best medicine" – must have been a doctor, or a clown, or both.

Clown doctors have travelled the globe healing and bringing laughter to thousands of patients, and this week three of the world's experts in the field are in Toronto for a symposium called A Healthy Dose of Laughter.

"Medical" clowning is practised in healthcare settings and has proven to be a vital part of patient recovery by minimizing stress and pain through the use of gentle play and humour.

Presented by the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (MNjcc) and the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, in partnership with the Therapeutic Clown Program at the Hospital for Sick Children and Baycrest, the symposium brings together artists and healthcare professionals to engage in the practice of therapeutic or "medical" clowning.

Dr. Peter Spitzer, Australia's most famous medical clown doctor and co-founder of the Humour Foundation; Dr. Atay Citron, founder of the Dream Doctors Medical Clowning degree program at Haifa University; and Canada's Dr. Bernie Warren, founder of Fools for Health in Windsor, Ont., along with Israeli actors/clowns Noam Rubinstein, Yolana Zimmerman and Fyodor Makarov, are participating in the weeklong symposium, which ends on March 6.

This week, the five clown doctors are sharing their knowledge at forums, workshops and presentations designed for healthcare professionals and artists working in Toronto hospitals and pediatric and geriatric facilities. The Dream Doctors will spend a day with the clowns at the Therapeutic Clown Program at SickKids.

The culmination of the conference is Odysseus Chaoticus, a clown/cabaret show presented by Israel's award-winning ISH Theatre, starring Zimmerman and Rubinstein and Russian-Israeli clown Makarov. Odysseus Chaoticus combines Homer's Odyssey with an eccentric Italian multi-generational family, packed like sardines into a small home. The show has toured Israel, Germany, eastern Europe and India.

"We are thrilled to be hosting this very special weeklong event," said Harriet Wichin, director of programming at Miles Nadal. "Upon seeing the show Odysseus Chaoticus in Israel, we learned that these talented clowns were hospital clowns... For the MNjcc, it's a natural fit – underscoring the importance of art, wellness and creativity at every age."

Odysseus Chaoticus has its Canadian première on March 4 at the MNjcc, Al Green Theatre, 8 p.m., with a second performance on March 6 at 8 p.m. For tickets, $18 for adults and $12 for those over 13 and seniors, visit www.algreentheatre.ca or call 416-924-6211, ext. 0.

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 20 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 10 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Wednesday, March 10, 2010 at Meron Banquet Hall. It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:00 p.m.

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-669-0777.

Bone marrow transplant may save mother's life

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Shari Ichelson Silverman has found her miracle. And it was all because of a cheek swab.

Ichelson Silverman, 34, was diagnosed with leukemia last summer and told that, without a bone marrow transplant, she would most likely die. Since then, it has been her mission to find a bone marrow donor not just for herself, but for everyone in need of a transplant.

This is how Shari's Mission, an organization that tries to find bone marrow matches through community drives, was born.

And on Valentine's Day, surrounded by friends, family and volunteers, Ichelson Silverman and her father, Mike Ichelson, announced that they had achieved one of their goals. Ichelson's daughter had found a match.

"We knew for about two weeks before that, but we wanted to get everybody together because so many people have put in so much effort," Ichelson said.

"It's everything we've prayed for. Everything [Shari] has prayed for. We were very worried that we'd never find a match on time. It's an everyday worry: am I going to live or not? Now she knows she has a chance to survive."

Since learning about his daughter's illness, Ichelson has been organizing drives, with the help of volunteers. At the drive, community members aged 17 to 50 are asked to swab the inside of their cheeks. All swabs are tested, and if a match is found, the person is called in for a blood test.

It will be about a year before Ichelson will know whether the successful swab was from one of his drives.

"It may not have been from ours. It could have been from Australia. We have no idea, and we won't know for a minimum of a year," he said, adding that, regardless of how the match was found, his daughter was ecstatic at the news.

"She has a chance to see her daughter grow up," Ichelson said. "We're incredulous. We're thrilled. We're also scared."

While Ichelson Silverman now has a good chance of beating her cancer, the transplant is risky.

On March 4, Ichelson Silverman will begin an intensive chemotherapy treatment, and on March 10, she will receive the bone marrow transplant. If the transplant is successful, then she'll get graft-versus-host disease, meaning that the cells in the new bone marrow will recognize the recipient cells as foreign and begin fighting them. While this is an important part of the process, it can result in severe consequences, such as the loss of her sight or the use of her tear ducts.

Shari Ichelson Silverman and her daughter Ashley-Ann

"She might have to be on dialysis, either temporarily or for life," Ichelson said. "These are things we don't know… we're praying she's not going to have severe long-term effects."

Even with these risks, Ichelson Silverman's family has been given hope. And they plan to do the same for as many people as they can.

"We are definitely continuing Shari's Mission. We have to pay it forward," Ichelson said, adding that he held a drive last month, from Feb. 26 to 28, at Vaughan Mills shopping centre.

"Somebody, somewhere [was] a match for Shari. We've got to find 870 matches for Canadians."

Ichelson recently learned that a New York man may have found a match through Shari's Mission.

"We're absolutely thrilled," he said, adding that nothing is official yet. "We didn't expect to hear anything maybe for years. To have found something so quickly is really heartening."

Because Ichelson Silverman is an Ashkenazi Jew, her family reached out to Toronto's Jewish community.

"The Jewish community has shown us such tremendous love and support," he said.

"People have come to drives for no other reason than to say, 'I've had a match, and this is what I'm going through.'"

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

Israel and U.S. on same Iran page: Kerry

By' BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United States doesn't believe Israel will act on its own against Iran's nuclear program, Democratic U.S. Senator John Kerry told reporters in Jerusalem on Monday, adding that Washington and Israel are in agreement on how to deal with the issue.

Alluding to the possibility that Israel would act militarily against Tehran, Kerry, speaking at a press conference following separate meetings with Opposition Leader Tzipi Livni and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, said he believed Netanyahu understood what the United States is trying to achieve with diplomacy.

"I think that the prime minister is fully aware through his conversations with the administration, as well as through his own comments, to not be rash or not jump the gun and to give the other opportunities a chance," Kerry said.

The U.S. senator, who is chair of the Senate committee on foreign relations, also said that increased discussion between the two allies, expected to continues with a planned visit by U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden, was meant to ensure Israel and the United States are "all on the same page on what options might be on the table."

"I think we are on the same page," Kerry said, adding that he "found the prime minister very supportive of the initiative we are taking right now and hopeful that they can have an impact."

Kerry's comments came just as the new chief of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Yukiya Amano, said earlier on Monday that he could not confirm that all of Iran's nuclear activities are peaceful, adding that Iran has not given the IAEA the level of co-operation necessary to make a determination on that issue.

Amano spoke Monday at the start of a 35-nation IAEA board meeting focusing on Iran's nuclear defiance.

Iran has refused to heed UN Security Council demands that it stop uranium enrichment. It also is stonewalling an IAEA probe of its alleged attempts to build a nuclear weapons program.

Iran insists its activities are peaceful. Many nations fear it wants to build nuclear weapons.

Also on Monday, Tehran's envoy to the IAEA said Iran has moved a stock of enriched uranium back underground after drawing what it needed to refine the material up to 20 per cent purity.

Iran has said its move to feed low-enriched uranium (LEU) into centrifuges for higher-scale refinement is for peaceful purposes so that it can make fuel for nuclear medicine.

Western officials and UN inspectors doubt Iran's explanation, since it lacks the technical capacity to convert higher-enriched uranium into fuel rods for its medical isotope reactor, whose Argentine-provided fuel stock is running out.

They fear Iran wants to advance along the road to producing high-enriched – 90 percent purity – uranium suitable for the fissile core of an atomic bomb, if it chose later to do so.

In related developments, an Israeli delegation that travelled to Beijing last week presented detailed intelligence on Iran's nuclear program in an attempt to persuade China that Tehran seeks atomic weapons, a senior diplomatic source told Ha'aretz.

The group, led by Strategic Affairs Minister Moshe Ya'alon and central bank chief Stanley Fischer, tried to persuade China to support sanctions on Iran by offering "the full intelligence picture available to Israel," the diplomat said.

The Israeli officials also told the Chinese that a nuclear Iran would push up oil prices. China depends on Iran for a large proportion of its imported oil.

Israel is trying to recruit China's support for a fourth round of sanctions against Iran, and the UN Security Council is due to vote on the issue in the coming months. At the very least, Israel wants to ensure China doesn't oppose the sanctions when they come to a vote.

Israel also wants to make sure China supports the report on Iran published by the IAEA's Amano. Unlike his predecessor, Mohamed ElBaradei, Amano discussed in his report the possibility that Iran might secretively be developing nuclear weapons.

China's official position is that Iran has a right to develop nuclear technology for peaceful, civilian purposes, and that there is no proof Iran has a military nuclear program.

"The Chinese were given the full intelligence picture Israel has about the Iranian nuclear program, which clearly shows Iran is developing nuclear weapons," the diplomatic source said.

"The delegation also stressed how concerned Israel was, and that all options must remain on the table," the source added.

The delegation that set out for Beijing in co-ordination with the U.S. administration also included senior officials in the Foreign Ministry, the National Security Council and the defense establishment. They met with a number of Chinese officials, the most senior being State Councillor Dai Bingguo.

According to the source, the Israelis spent two hours giving the Chinese an overview of intelligence information Israel has on Iran's nuclear program. This was the most detailed overview given by Israel to China in more than three years, since then-prime minister Ehud Olmert's visit in January 2007.

The Israeli delegation left with a positive feeling, the source said, with the Chinese saying they would seriously consider the information they received. Talks were conducted in a friendly atmosphere, with Beijing stressing the importance of Chinese-Israeli relations and its desire to develop ties further, the source said.

Orthodox rabbi condemned for ordaining woman

JTA

NEW YORK — The Agudath Israel Council of Torah Sages has issued a statement suggesting that a New York rabbi should no longer be considered Orthodox because of his decision to ordain a woman.

Last month, Rabbi Avi Weiss announced that one of his female students would now be known as rabba – a feminized version of rabbi – replacing her previous title of "maharat." He declared in a statement that the name change "makes it clear that Sara Hurwitz is a full member of our rabbinic staff" at the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale, a modern Orthodox synagogue in the Bronx where he is the spiritual leader.

The Agudath Israel council, comprised of leading haredi rabbis, declared in its Feb. 25 statement that "these developments represent a radical and dangerous departure from Jewish tradition and the mesoras haTorah, and must be condemned in the strongest terms." The statement, which was signed by 10 members of the council, added: "Any congregation with a woman in a rabbinical position of any sort cannot be considered Orthodox."

Rabbi Avi Weiss

Rabba Hurwitz, who has served at the Hebrew Institute for nearly seven years, performs some rabbinic duties, but cannot perform others because of her gender, including acting as a witness, leading religious services and being counted in a minyan.

In recent years, a handful of prominent mainstream modern Orthodox synagogues have hired women for roles like Rabba Hurwitz's, in which they carry out certain functions that historically were the sole domain of male rabbis, from offering guidance in spiritual or Jewish legal matters to teaching classes and delivering lectures.

Agudath Israel spokesman Rabbi Avi Shafran said that the council's objection to Rabba Hurwitz's situation is that she is considered a "full member" of the rabbinic staff, in violation of the Orthodox value of "tzniut," or modesty, for women.

"Some of the roles intended for the 'rabba' are in fact roles that women even in the haredi community have played for centuries, such as counselling and offering wise advice," he said. " Others, though, are not, especially those that thrust a woman into a public venue."

The council also objects, Rabbi Shafran added, because any change in Orthodox norms must be backed by a "world-class Torah decisor," and no such authority has lent his name to Rabbi Weiss' actions.

Meanwhile, the New York Jewish Week cited an unnamed source close to Rabbi Weiss as saying that the Rabbinical Council of America, the modern Orthodox rabbinical group, is considering kicking Rabbi Weiss out of its organization. Like many members of the RCA, Rabbi Weiss received his ordination from the Yeshiva University-affiliated Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary.

The RCA has refused to grant membership to graduates of the liberal Orthodox seminary, Yeshivat Chovevei Torah, founded by Rabbi Weiss.

Israelis no longer allowed in Dubai: police chief

By BARAK RAVID

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Travellers suspected of being Israeli will not be allowed into the United Arab Emirates, even if they arrive with alternative passports, Dubai's police chief said on Monday. Lt.-Gen. Dahi Khalfan Tamim said the move comes after the killing in Dubai of a Hamas operative, for which Emirates authorities blame Israel's Mossad spy agency.

Tamim said a 26-member team used European and Australian passports to enter Dubai, a member of the United Arab Emirates (UAE), in January and kill Mahmoud al-Mabhouh.

The Emirates will now deny entry to anyone suspected of having Israeli citizenship, Tamim said at a security conference in Abu Dhabi Monday.

It was unclear if the measure would apply to Israeli athletes competing in international sports events being held there, such as tennis player Shahar Peer, a recent semifinalist in the local Women's Tennis Association tournament.

Earlier, Tamim had charged Mossad with insulting Dubai as well as the countries whose forged passports were used in the assassination of the Hamas military commander last month.

The Dubai police chief also said a 27th member of the team that killed Mabhouh in his hotel room had been identified, saying only that it was a woman.

"Mossad shouldn't come to us. We haven't done anything to Israel. This is an insult to us, to Britain, to Australia, to Germany and to New Zealand, and it's shameful," Tamim told reporters in Dubai.

Israel has not confirmed or denied it played any role, but Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman said there was nothing to link it to the killing. Hamas said Mabhouh played a role in smuggling weapons from Iran into the Gaza Strip, which Hamas runs.

The UAE, an Arab state that backs Palestinians seeking an independent state, has no diplomatic relations with Israel. But it has established low-level political and trade links in recent years, with some Israeli officials attending events in the Arab Gulf state. Tamim said dual passport holders with Israeli nationality would face extra security procedures in the future, and predicted the alleged hit team would have problems travelling outside Israel.

People with the same names as many of the suspects live in Israel and say their identities were stolen. The passport abuse has drawn criticism from the European Union, and some of the governments involved have summoned the Israeli ambassadors to their countries to protest.

Dubai police said Sunday that the killers drugged Mabhouh with a muscle relaxant before suffocating him.

Meanwhile, Australian investigators are expected in Israel in the coming days to question several dual nationals whose names have been connected to Mabhouh's assassination.

Israel agreed to allow two or three Australian police officers to question the dual citizens, after Australia's Foreign Ministry on Sunday requested approval from the Israeli envoy in Canberra to dispatch the investigators. Australia said last week that it was not satisfied with the Israeli envoy's explanation of the use of fraudulent Australian passports in the killing, after three people holding Australian passports were listed among 15 new suspects.

At least two of the 26 suspected members of the team that tracked and killed Mabhouh in Dubai last month travelled to the United States shortly after his death, the Wall Street Journal reported on Monday. Records show one of the suspects entered the United States on Jan. 21 using an Irish passport, and another arrived on Feb. 14 using a British passport, the Wall Street Journal reported, quoting "a person familiar with the situation."

Spokepeople for both the U.S. State Department and Interpol declined to comment on the Wall Street Journal report.

Hamas founder's son worked for Shin Bet

By AVI ISSACHAROFF

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The son of a leading Hamas figure, who famously converted to Christianity, served for more than a decade as the Shin Bet security service's most valuable source in the militant organization's leadership.

Mosab Hassan Yousef is the son of Sheikh Hassan Yousef, a Hamas founder and one of its leaders in the West Bank. The intelligence he supplied Israel led to the exposure of a number of terrorist cells, and to the prevention of dozens of suicide bombings and assassination attempts on Israeli figures. Yousef's memoir, Son of Hamas, written with Ron Brackin, will be released this week in the United States. Yousef, 32, became a devout Christian 10 years ago and now lives in California, after fleeing the West Bank in 2007 and going public with his conversion.

Yousef was considered the Shin Bet's most reliable source in the Hamas leadership. During the second intifadah, intelligence Yousef supplied led to the arrests of a number of high-ranking Palestinian figures responsible for planning deadly suicide bombings. These included Ibrahim Hamid, a Hamas military commander in the West Bank; Marwan Barghouti, the founder of the Fatah-linked Tanzim militia, and Abdullah Barghouti, a Hamas bomb-maker with no close relation to the Fatah figure. Yousef was also responsible for thwarting Israel's plan to assassinate his father.

"I wish I were in Gaza now," Yousef said by phone from California, "I would put on an army uniform and join Israel's special forces in order to liberate Gilad Schalit. If I were there, I could help."

Yousef is now exposing the secret he kept since 1996, when he was first held by Shin Bet agents seeking to enlist him in infiltrating the upper echelon of Hamas. Their efforts proved successful, and Yousef was released from prison in 1997. His former handler, who no longer serves with the security service, says Yousef collaborated with Israel because he wanted to save lives.

"So many people owe him their life and don't even know it," said the handler, named in Yousef's book as Captain Loai. "People who did a lot less were awarded the Israel Security Prize. He certainly deserves it."

Loai makes no secret of his admiration for his former source. "The amazing thing is that none of his actions were done for money," he says. "He did things he believed in. He wanted to save lives. His grasp of intelligence matters was just as good as ours – the ideas, the insights. One insight of his was worth 1,000 hours of thought by top experts."

Loai recalled one time when the Shin Bet received information that a suicide bomber was going to be picked up at Manara Square in Ramallah and be given an explosives belt.

"We didn't know his name or what he looked like – only that he was in his 20s and would be wearing a red shirt," he said. "We sent the Green Prince to the square and with his acute sense, he located the target within minutes. So another attack was thwarted, though no one knows about it.

With his memoir, Yousef hopes to send a message of peace to Israelis. Still, he admits he is pessimistic over the prospect of Israel signing a peace agreement with the Fatah-led Palestinian Authority, let alone Hamas. "Hamas cannot make peace with the Israelis. That is against what their God tells them. It is impossible to make peace with infidels, only a ceasefire, and no one knows that better than I. The Hamas leadership is responsible for the killing of Palestinians, not Israelis," he said. "Palestinians! They do not hesitate to massacre people in a mosque or to throw people from the 15th or 17th floor of a building, as they did during the coup in Gaza. The Israelis would never do such things. I tell you with certainty that the Israelis care about the Palestinians far more than the Hamas or Fatah leadership does."

Olmert trial begins

Former prime minister Ehud Olmert asserted his innocence at the start of his trial on corruption charges in Jerusalem District Court last week. "Several months ago, when I came here for the first time, I said that I came as an innocent man and that I would leave as an innocent man," Olmert said. Olmert is charged with fraud, breach of trust, falsifying corporate records and tax evasion in relation to three incidents: allegedly paying for family vacations by double billing Jewish organizations through the Rishon Tours travel agency; allegedly accepting envelopes of cash from U.S. businessman Morris Talansky, and allegedly granting personal favours to attorney Uri Messer when he served as trade minister in the Investment Center case. Olmert is the first former Israeli prime minister to stand trial. He resigned in September 2008 after police recommended that he be indicted.

Hebron riots continue

Palestinian riots continued in Hebron five days after the city's Cave of the Patriarchs was designated an Israeli national heritage site. As Palestinian schoolchildren demonstrated Feb. 25 near the site, other Palestinian protesters set tires on fire and threw stones at Israeli soldiers and police. More than 300 Palestinians in Hebron clashed with Israelis soldiers while marking the anniversary of the murder of 29 Muslims by Jewish radical Baruch Goldstein at the cave's Ibrahimi Mosque in 1994. Goldstein was beaten to death at the scene of the attack, which also injured about 150 people.

More Iranian threats

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Arab nations will usher in a new Middle East "without Zionists and without colonialists." He made the statement during a two-day visit to Syria to meet with President Bashar Assad. "If the Zionist regime wants to repeat its past mistakes, this will constitute its demise and annihilation," Ahmadinejad added during a news conference with Assad. Ahmadinejad met in Damascus with Assad and with Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah.

MIRVISH TO BRING JAKE EHRENREICH'S A JEW GROWS IN BROOKLYN TO TORONTO

Mirvish Productions announced last week that it is bringing the hit musical A Jew Grows in Brooklyn to Toronto, the company announced last week. The play's creator, Jake Ehrenreich, has been touring across the United States since the production became a "smash hit" during its debut run of more than a year in New York.

Jake Ehrenreich

The play – which the New York Times compared to Billy Crystal's 700 Sundays – has been described as a "rock 'n' roll true story, Holocaust family, Borscht-belt comedy musical." It presents Ehrenreich's true story growing up in Brooklyn and his search for identity. Being a child of Holocaust survivors made him determined to conform to his vision of what it meant to be a "real" American. But he always felt uncomfortable with his identity and with his family's haunting past.

The play's title seems to allude to the popular 1943 novel A Tree Grows in Brooklyn, by Betty Smith. Ehrenreich has also signed a book contract with Heath Communications, the company that produced the Chicken Soup for the Soul series of books. A Jew Grows in Brooklyn is at Toronto's Panasonic Theatre, April 28 to May 16. $60 to $25. 416-872-1212, www.mirvish.com

Yiddish Music & More: Psoy Korolenko, a renowned performer of Yiddish music from Moscow, presents Virtual Nostalgia, Second Degree, a concert of Soviet popular hits and post-shtetl songs in Russian, Yiddish and Moldavian to mark the conclusion of a unique daylong symposium on Yiddish culture this week at the University of Toronto. The concert is at the Robert Gill Theatre, 214 College St., third floor (enter from St. George Street) Sunday, March 7, 8 p.m.

The symposium – "Ethnography, Culture and Oral History of Yiddish Speakers in Contemporary Eastern Europe" – features a variety of speakers, 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. on March 7. Sponsors are the Centre for Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto, Al and Malka Green Yiddish Studies Program, Centre for European, Russian and Eurasian Studies, and Helen Zukerman Family Foundation. 416-978-1624, www.cjs.utoronto.ca

Bloody Cartoons* at the ROM: Twelve editorial cartoons published in a Danish national newspaper set the Muslim world on edge and provoked violence and death threats in 2005. Bloody Cartoons, a forceful documentary by Karsten Kjaer, investigates the shocking reaction by many Muslims to the cartoons. After the screening, a panel of guest experts discuss the role of the press in dealing with controversial issues, censorship and freedom of expression. Royal Ontario Museum, Signy and Cléophée Eaton Theatre, ROM Level 1B (enter at south end of the museum). Tuesday, March 9, 7 p.m. $10, $8, $6, at the door.

Names in the News: Academy Award-nominated actor Colin Firth, perhaps best known as Mr. Darcy in a classic BBC production of Pride and Prejudice, has been cast as Jewish underground leader Avraham Stern in The Promised Land, a new movie set to start filming this summer.

The story is a political crime thriller set in British Mandate Palestine that takes place in the years before the formation of the state of Israel. The Stern Gang, also known as Lehi, fought against the British Mandate in Palestine in the 1930s and 1940s. Matthew Macfadyen and Jim Sturgess will play British police officers trying to quash the Stern Gang.

Artist paints portraits of Olympic athletes

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Margaret Florence Ludwig doesn't care about getting cold, wet or dirty. All she cares about is painting.

Ludwig, 81, has been painting and drawing almost as long as she remembers. Her first drawings were of Mickey Mouse or Pluto, and they were so good her mother lectured her about tracing from a book.

Born in Peterborough, Ont., she loves the outdoors almost as much as she loves painting its scenery.

When creating landscapes, she works fast, making use of every beam of sunlight, every glimmer of ice.

When inspired, she can paint for hours, eating only what she stuffed into her pockets in the morning and finishing up to five paintings a day.

"I wear the same clothes all the time. I get paint on myself, and I don't care because that's what I like to do," she said.

Ludwig, a member of the Portrait Society of Canada and the Drawing Society of Canada, has sold her paintings in Canada, the United States and England.

The artist enjoys painting winter landscapes, and has painted in the Antarctic and Greenland. On these trips, some of her colleagues take photos of the landscape, go into their cottages, turn up the heat and paint. Ludwig likes the cold.

"You just get a different spirit in your work than if you're just clicking away and going back to draw from your digital [photos]… A lot of people say it's warm [in their cottages], the radio's on, I don't want that," she said.

"I want to think… I've got this whole world to myself… You're actually there, you feel the wind, you feel the sun, you try to get that in your work."

As a painter, Ludwig enjoys getting away from the city. Apart from Greenland and the Antarctic, she's also been to Baffin Island, Nunavut.

"Everything is just so fresh and so primitive. You get overwhelmed by it. It's almost untouched," she said of these landscapes. "It's a whole different experience away from the city, away from the smoke."

Margaret Florence Ludwig's portraits of Olympic athletes are on display this month in a group exhibit at Toronto's John B. Aird Gallery.

Ludwig also enjoys painting portraits. Three of them will be on display in an upcoming exhibit of portraits of Canadian athletes. One is of Petra Burka, a former world champion figure skater, and the other two are of Jennifer Robinson, a figure skater who competed in the 2002 Winter Olympic Games in Salt Lake City. Since Ludwig prefers working with people rather than painting from a photo, both skaters came to pose at her studio.

"I always prefer when they're alive and in front of you. You have a different relationship with the person. I think it comes out in your work," she said. "A slight smile, a slight change of light can change their whole personality. It's such a challenge. It's so much more interesting [than painting from a photo]."

When painting portraits, Ludwig said her role is to capture the person's personality, something she can't do without interacting with her subjects.

"When you're doing a portrait, you have to try to catch that personality of the individual. When you're doing a landscape, you're putting your own personality into it," she said. "I guess when you're talking to them beforehand and during their breaks, you get to know them a little better."

When painting, Ludwig uses oil paints rather than acrylics. She doesn't usually plan out her paintings with pencil drawings, mainly because she already knows how she wants the finished product to look.

"You can plan, but I just know what I'm going to do," she said. "I'm sort of a hit or miss person. Not everything you do turns out well."

As a painter, Ludwig doesn't have regular business hours. She'll paint several times a week and has been known to ask her guests or grandchildren, of which she has 13, to pose for her on a whim.

"I don't know why I'm like this… I've done it all my life. I guess it's just me," she said.

"Canadian Olympic Athletes: A Dialogue in Art," presented by the Portrait Society, will be on exhibit at Toronto's John B. Aird Gallery to March 26, with an opening reception on March 4 from 6 to 8 p.m. For more information, call Linda Litwack at 416-782-7837 or e-mail lalitwack@rogers.com.

Four years ago, Ariel Platt had never heard of spoken word competitions or poetry slams, where poems are judged by the audience.

But on March 10, Toronto writer Platt will compete at an all-female spoken word competition in Columbus, Ohio, along with 65 other poets.

This isn't the first time she'll be on an international stage performing poems to hundreds. Platt, 31, was a member of the 2009 Toronto Poetry Slam Team, a group of poets who competed at the U.S. National Poetry Slam in West Palm Beach, Fla., and then at Victoria's Canadian Festival of Spoken Word.

Her poetry has also hit the local stage – her one-woman Fringe Festival show, Down to the Underwire, was described by the Toronto Star as universally appealing, "dealing with themes such as happiness and honesty as she lets us into her personal life."

"I write how I speak," says Platt in an interview. "Maybe I go extreme, but it's not far off from what I'd actually say."

Her poems touch on myriad topics, most of them spiced with her sharp humour. She's offered audiences poems on self-esteem, body image, narrow-minded boyfriends, best friends and, like any good Jewish daughter, odes to her parents.

Sometimes, she veers from her rapid-fire punch lines and rhyming jokes. "One poem that I have, which is about physical violence, was literally written because I wanted to prove to myself and to another poet that I could write about a serious topic, effectively."

A graduate of Forest Hill Collegiate Institute and York University, Platt says she has found a supportive community in Toronto's spoken word scene. "I know it sounds counter-intuitive, but yes, people in Toronto are so friendly," she says, tongue-in-cheek.

She also credits her family for believing in this grassroots art form. When Platt was first featured at the venerable Art Bar Poetry Series in downtown Toronto, "my mom had never heard of slam poetry and likely thought she was up for a night of cryptic poetry, and that my work wouldn't be accessible," recounts Platt. "Needless to say she loved the show. She and my dad are not only my biggest fans, they also come to many of my performances and often bring their friends."

Ariel Platt

At the Women of the World event, Platt is excited to showcase her work to a new audience in Ohio, but she's also trying to get rid of the butterflies in her stomach. "At the poetry slams and festivals last year, I competed with a team, but now no one has my back, really," she says. "It's just me, which is intimidating, but the event seems interesting and diverse."

What about the Jewish content in her poems? After all, she's enmeshed in Jewish culture in her career, as an on-site event novelty popular at bar mitzvahs. It would be too glib to call her poems Jewish, per se, but she does pepper her work with a few lines fellow Jews might appreciate. For instance, "People ask where my family is from. I reply, 'All four of my grandparents were born here in Canada.'

"They follow up with, 'Are you Jewish?' Mazel tov on your Jewdar, I'm not sure why you asked. I didn't ask if you were a gentile. Did you want to talk bar mitzvahs, JDate or Yentl? I don't often go to synagogue, but I don't judge those who do. I guess I'm what they'll call a traditional bacon-eating Jew."

Beyond trying to get her work into schools – both Jewish and public – Platt has been encouraged by the recent addition of spoken word into the Winter Olympics' opening ceremony in Vancouver. "The sky's the limit," she says. "I'm always keeping my eyes and ears open."

An Israeli industrial design exhibit, opening this week at the Design Exchange, features an eclectic collection of works.

Design Exchange features Israeli exhibit

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

An exhibit of contemporary Israeli industrial design opens this week at the Design Exchange in Toronto.

"From Mediterranean Traditional to Israeli Contemporary Design" runs March 6 to June 20, in the Toronto-Dominion Centre at 234 Bay St.

Curated by Tel Aviv-based designer Alon Razgour, the exhibit features 60 works, among them lighting, furniture, pieces of industrial design, and objets d'art including a cushy, colourful "Feel seat" by Sarit Attias and Amit Axelrod of Animi Causa, and at least one item of Judaica – a modern take on a vessel used for ritual handwashing from Zivia Sustainable Design and Consultancy Studio.

Participating designers include Ezri Tarazi, Animi Causa, Umamy, Doron Oryan, Eran Apelbaum, Sarit Atztiz, Yael Yarzin, VONS, Michal Greenberg Abrahami, Ami Drach and Dov Ganchrow, Yaacov Kaufman, Studio Groovy, Reddish, Leor & Lederman, Yuval Tal, and Eilon Armon.

Visitors to the exhibit are eligible to win a one-week trip for two to Israel. The trip is sponsored in partnership with the Israel Government Tourist Office, Air Canada, Peerless Travel & Cruises, the Carlton Tel Aviv and Inbal Jerusalem Hotel.

Israeli culture combines many diverse influences, according to the Design Exchange's website.

"The Israeli culture and history stimulate innovation in design while preserving traditions that embody the society. These traditions include a vivid sense of humour, a rejection of bourgeois ideas of beauty, and a cunning use of new and used materials," the site says.

The Design Exchange opened 15 years ago, in the autumn of 1994. Its aims include promoting the value of Canadian design and establishing Canada as a design leader worldwide.

Admission is $10 for adults, $8 for students and seniors, and free for members. For further information, go to dx.org, the website of the Design Exchange.

Kids learn confidence through judo, trainer says

By MICHELLE BITRAN
Special to The CJN

Erez Cohen didn't exactly plan to move to Canada. But since he arrived here about two years ago, the 29-year-old personal trainer and former Mr. Israel has certainly been making his mark in Toronto.

Erez Cohen, centre, teaches judo to kids with behavioural problems. From left are Maurice Fidd 7, Angel Araujo, 7, Jasiah Morgridge, 8.

"I came to visit a friend of mine and one thing led to another, I started to train one person, and a month after, I'm living here," he said, laughing.

Cohen was born in a rough neighbourhood in B'nei Brak, Israel, and, after extensive study in martial arts, went on to serve in the elite anti-terror unit in the Israel Defence Forces for four years.

Certified in judo since the age of 16, Cohen was a five-time national judo champion in Israel and also earned a spot on the Israeli national Olympic team.

In Canada, he joined the judo team competing in the 2009 Maccabiah Games. Though Cohen is accomplished in both sambo, a Russian martial art, and krav maga, an Israeli hand-to-hand combat system, he maintains that judo is the most powerful martial art form.

"It gives the physical and spiritual side as well," he said, adding that judo allows smaller fighters to beat their larger opponents through the use of simple laws of physics.

Since coming to Toronto, Cohen worked with the children of some of his training clients, teaching them judo in order to build their confidence. According to Cohen, judo has been a form of therapy for some of these kids, giving them the self-esteem to overcome problems with bullying at school.

It was these positive results that led Cohen to offer his training skills to children with behavioural issues at Yorkwoods Public School, in the Jane Street and Finch Avenue area.

He spends an hour and a half each week with the behavioural intensive support program class of four kids aged six to eight, engaging them in physical activity and teaching them teamwork and co-operative skills through sport.

"They so look forward to it," said Barb Nyman, who teaches the behavioural class with the help of child and youth worker Melissa Hardy. Nyman added that the physical activity and the emphasis Cohen puts on teamwork helps the kids work through problems with aggression.

"I remember when I was a kid, no one really did anything like this for us," said Cohen, who recalls growing up in an underprivileged community. According to Hardy, Cohen not only provides the kids with a new set of skills, but also gives them a strong and caring male role model, something that many of them are missing.

Erez Cohen, 29, a personal trainer in Toronto, was a five-time national judo champion in Israel.

Erez Cohen leads a judo lesson at Yorkwoods Public School.

"I love those kids, they're very sweet," said Cohen, going on to describe the pictures they made him for his birthday.

"It was the best present," he said, adding that, because the children see their judo lessons as a game, it's easier for them to work together and to cheer each other on.

"The idea is to get them slowly integrated into a larger classroom atmosphere," said Nyman, explaining that the control the children learn in Cohen's lessons helps them work towards this goal. Also, the opportunity to interact with a new teacher-figure enriches the students' learning experience.

It is for this reason that Cohen makes an effort to bring other people with him to the classroom, including his brother and friends with martial arts experience.

"It's a good thing for [the people that come to help], you feel satisfied after," said Cohen.

When Cohen is not at Yorkwoods Public School, he is busy training his clients. As his client list expanded to its current 200 members, Cohen decided to open a gym to better serve the growing demand. About two months ago, he started Powerclub with his brother, Oren, who moved to Toronto from Israel only a few months ago.

The boutique gym, designed with Cohen's help, is modern and sleek, featuring an army-themed martial arts room and change-room countertops imported from Israel.

Cohen's penchant for interior design extends from his love of art and painting, a talent of his that clients are quick to pick up on and support. He has already sold a few paintings, and has others on display around the city.

Cohen's oldest client is 85, and has no trouble keeping up. Cohen attributes his success with clients to the extensive four-year course that certified him as a personal trainer in Israel, where he learned kinesiology and physiology.

"Not anyone that can make you sweat is a good trainer," he said.

Cohen hopes to expand his gym and to bring martial arts competitors from Israel and train them to compete in Canada. This coming summer, he plans to take some of his Canadian clients to Israel for an intensive fitness training camp. Cohen, whose family still lives in Israel, goes home to visit several times each year.

But he doesn't feel like much of a stranger in Toronto.

"The Jewish community here is something that you never see anywhere," he said. "The way that they're working together and helping each other, supporting each other – it's very rare."

'It feels good to be Jewish,' says convert Benjamin Errett

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Call it, if you must, a story of goy meets girl. Nine years after meeting the love of his life and soulmate, Benjamin Errett, a 31-year-old Toronto journalist, has written a humorous, perceptive and heart-warming account of his romance with and marriage to Sarah Lazarovic, a filmmaker, animator and illustrator.

If a movie is ever made about their fateful encounter, it might be titled When Benjamin Met Sarah.

In the meantime, you can read all about it in Errett's book, Jew and Improved: How Choosing To Be Chosen Made Me Into a Better Man, published by HarperCollins last month.

Errett's lucid account of his intellectual and emotional journey from Christianity to Judaism, climaxed by conversion, circumcision, immersion in a mikvah and a joyous wedding, is the stuff of a novel or a film.

The features editor of the National Post, he decided to document his odyssey in book form after answering an avalanche of questions from friends and acquaintances about his motives and starting a blog about his adventures in Judaism.

Benjamin Errett

"There was a story to be told," said Errett, a slim, lanky fellow with intensely blue eyes and an open manner, in an interview. "But it never occurred to me to turn it into a book, though every journalist dreams of writing one."

Born in Kingston, Ont., and raised in Connecticut, he met his better half when he was editor-in-chief of the McGill Daily at McGill University in Montreal.

Lazarovic, raised in Florida but with relatives in Montreal, was a volunteer for an animal rights organization when she walked into the offices of the campus newspaper.

Unlike Errett, who had distanced himself from Christianity, she was thoroughly Jewish, so much so that at one point she even toyed with the notion of becoming a cantor.

"The first time I met Sarah, I thought she was crazy," he writes. "She had come into [our] offices with a story we just had to cover." Although her idea left him rather cold, Errett – a biology major who had aspirations of studying medicine – was intrigued by Lazarovic, a nice Jewish girl who had given up all hope of meeting a nice Jewish boy.

Pursuing her after she joined the staff of the McGill Daily as culture editor, he asked her out on a series of "kinda-sorta dates."

Initially, he was not sure whether this was friendship or love. "In retrospect," he writes self-deprecatingly, "I was oblivious." But after their eighth date, he was hooked, positively smitten.

Shortly afterward, Errett – an agnostic whose father had converted from Protestanism to Catholicism to please his Catholic wife – informed his beloved that he would convert to Judaism for the sake of their future children, and asked for her hand in marriage.

Errett was also drawn to Judaism because it felt "very right and natural" to him after he had been exposed to it, thanks to Lazarovic's parents.

Acting on his convictions, he decided to take a year of classes in Judaism. His sponsoring rabbi was Ed Elkin of the Narayever Congregation in midtown Toronto.

To help ease his way into the tribe, Errett's mother offered to convert to Judaism. His father, though supportive of his decision to become a Jew, was nevertheless somewhat confused.

As part of the process, he and Lazarovic visited Israel, where he learned that life is lived at full volume.

Through her paternal grandmother, a Holocaust survivor in Montreal, Errett deepened his knowledge of this castastrophic event and, more importantly, strengthened his bond with his fiancée.

Having discovered that observant Jews subscribe to 613 commandments, he decided to follow only those that made sense to him and ignore or downplay the rest.

After passing his formal exam in Judaism with flying colours, he submitted to a brit milah, which he'd dreaded but which turned out to be a quick, superficial and relatively painless procedure administered by a physician.

Rinsed and naked after immersing himself in a mikvah, Errett repeated after the rabbi, "Of my own free will I choose to become a Jew."

Treating himself to his first meal as a Jew after the ceremony at the mikvah, he devoured a smoked meat sandwich, fries, cole slaw and a kosher dill pickle, washed down with a glass of ginger ale, at Yitz's Delicatessen in Toronto.

He and his bride were married at Temple Emanu-El, a Reform synagogue in Montreal, on June 14, 2008. The officiating rabbi was Leigh Lerner.

"The rings were exchanged, I kissed the bride and crushed the glass," he writes.

More than a year after he and Lazarovic exchanged vows, Errett definitely feels like a different and better person.

"I feel I'm more whole. I've assimilated Judaism into who I am. Judaism is a religion that makes sense to me on a basic level. I can walk into a temple now without feeling like an imposter. There is no glass ceiling. Converts are treated just like born Jews."

No longer an agnostic, he is now a believer and has a much more nuanced understanding of religion.

"Judaism offers comfort, culture, community, tradition and belonging," he observed.

As a Jew, Errett looks at the world through new eyes.

"I read a newspaper differently. I read stories on Israel more closely. I have a personal stake in Israel. Shabbat means something. It divides my work week. I like the concept of Jewish time, of organizing my life around a set of High Holidays. Judaism is compatible with my life."

He and his wife observe major Jewish holidays, attend services at the Narayever Congregation twice a month and keep Jewish-themed books and magazines in their home in the Annex.

When he embarked on his spiritual quest, Errett knew very little about Jewish history, but today he has a "rough understanding" of it, as he modestly remarked.

He follows current events in the Jewish state with interest, describing Israel as one of the most complicated countries he has ever visited. "But I wouldn't say I feel at home in Israel."

For much of his adulthood, as he muses in Jew and Improved, Errett was "unemployed, spiritually speaking," a "Christmas and Easter Catholic" who was really averse to religion.

But having made an extraordinary spiritual and religious choice, he feels immeasurably enriched and fulfilled. As he said, "It feels good to be Jewish."

Journalist I.F. Stone scoured government documents for truth

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

D. D. Guttenplan's nuanced biography of iconoclastic American reporter Isidor Feinstein Stone, commonly known as I.F. Stone, leaves few, if any, stones unturned. A journalist himself, the author takes a reader on a journey of discovery from Stone's birth in Philadelphia in 1907 to his death in Boston in 1989.

Guttenplan, in American Radical: The Life and Times of I.F. Stone (HarperCollins), admiringly calls his cantankerous and outspoken subject an independent thinker, a skeptic and a troublemaker who fought for his causes and was always ready to defend them fearlessly.

In a long, sometimes rocky career, Stone dedicated himself to equality for African-Americans, government assistance for the poor, economic justice for farm labourers and factory workers, universal health care, a negotiated end to the Cold War, the abolition of nuclear weapons, a two-state solution to resolve Israel's struggle with the Palestinians and, of course, the right to dissent.

A leftist who supported Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal, railed against McCarthyism and criticized the United States' involvement in the Vietnam War, he focused on what Guttenplan describes as "inconvenient truths."

Although he wrote for a variety of daily newspapers and magazines, from the New York Post to the Nation, Stone is probably best known for founding the independent newsletter, I.F. Stone's Weekly. Blacklisted and unable to find gainful employment due to his views, Stone established the spunky newsletter in the winter of 1953, when McCarthyism was at its height.

At its peak in the 1960s, I.F. Stone's Weekly had a circulation of about 70,000, and was read by Americans who wanted the real scoop on a current developments.

Stone, a prodigious researcher who scoured government documents in the search for truth, was the only reporter to challenge Washington's official account of the 1964 Gulf of Tonkin incident, which provided the president, Lyndon B. Johnson, with the pretext to escalate the war in Vietnam.

Beyond journalism, Stone was a prolific writer of books, with 14 to his credit. His first book, The Court Disposes, published in 1937, was a critical analysis of the U.S. Supreme Court. His last, Best of I.F. Stone, an anthology, was published posthumously in 2006.

By Guttenplan's estimate, Stone's reputation reached an all-time high in 1971, when his final collection of essays, Polemics and Prophecies, attracted unanimously admiring reviews and he received the George Polk Award, a glittering prize in mainstream journalism.

In his acceptance speech, Stone said he was "happy" to be the recipient of "my first establishment award." Yet he remained true to his beliefs, later telling an interviewer that the American Dream "is becoming a nightmare of rotting cities, growing race revolt and a decline of the once almighty dollar as we continue to squander on our overgrown military establishment abroad the billions we need for reconstruction at home."

One can only imagine how much ink he might have spilled had he lived to witness the outbreak of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Just as 1971 was a golden year for Stone, so it was also a year of decline for him. Due to an illness that incapacitated him, he was forced to sell his subscription list to the New York Review of Books, which promptly and unceremoniously closed I.F. Stone's Weekly.

"After… more than 3.5 million words, the longest essay in single-handed journalism in American history was over," Guttenplan observes. "I.F. Stone's pilgrimage from outcast to institution was complete."

The son of Russian Jewish immigrants, Stone gravitated to journalism in high school. After dropping out of the University of Pennsylvania, he joined the staff of a staunch Republican daily, The Philadelphia Inquirer. He soon switched sides, joining its morning rival, the liberal Philadephia Record.

When the Record's owner, David Stern, bought the New York Post, Stone became one of his earliest recruits, prized for his skill as a penetrating analyst.

But after refusing to write a pandering editorial for his boss, he left the Post and morphed into a columnist for the Nation and PM, an upstart Manhattan-based daily.

By then, he had anglicized his name. As Guttenplan puts it, "This was the era, after all, that saw Julius Garfinkel become John Garfield [the Hollywood actor] and Billy Chonofsky give way to the urbane William Shawn [the editor of The New Yorker]."

Despite his penchant for adopting generally unpopular causes, Stone was strangely quiet about the internment of Japanese Americans during World War II. As Guttenplan archly notes, Stone did not write a single word in protest about it. And though Stone abhorred racism, he sent his children to segregated schools in Washington, D.C., he adds.

A thoroughly secular Jew, Stone was outraged by Roosevelt's inaction during the Holocaust. "The Jews of Europe could do with a litttle less pity and a little more help," he wrote in 1944.

Stone was introduced to the Zionist cause by, among others, Teddy Kollek, the Haganah's representative in New York City and the future mayor of Jerusalem, and Eliahu Elath, a Jewish Agency emissary and a future president of the Hebrew University.

Dispatched to Palestine by PM in 1945, Stone filed vivid dispatches of his impressions of the Yishuv. "It is the only place in the world where Jews seem completely unafraid," he wrote. "In Palestine, a Jew can be a Jew."

Nonetheless, Stone was not initially an advocate of Jewish statehood. He preferred a binational state within a broader Arab federation, claiming it was "the only just solution."

Upon his return to the United States, Stone wrote Underground to Palestine, which described the Haganah's role in bringing displaced European Jewish refugees to the Jewish homeland. The book gave him a national audience for the first time.

On his second trip to Palestine, in 1948, Stone witnessed David Ben-Gurion, the incoming prime minister, proclaim the creation of Israel. Some days later, while covering the fighting in the Negev, he lay helplessly in a ditch as Egyptian planes bombed the area.

"Covering Israel's War of Independence brought I.F. Stone closer to Zionism than to any of his life's other causes," writes Guttenplan.

In collaboration with photographer Robert Capa, Stone produced This Is Israel, "an affectionate, intimate portrait" of the new state.

Till the end of his days, Stone was pro-Israel, but he reserved the right to chart his own course. He praised Israel's victory in the Six Day War as "brilliant," but called for a Palestinian state and warned that "reconciliation with the Arabs" was more urgent than ever.

"For me," he concluded, "the Arab-Jewish struggle is a tragedy… a struggle of right against right."

Summing him up, Guttenplan says Stone was a great reporter, a literate, curious and conscientious man who was totally dedicated to his craft.

As Guttenplan writes, "His consciousness of history, and the sense of himself and his subjects as participants in a complex and long-unfolding drama, gave his best work a pace and solidity that will outlast any headline."

Young Canadian immigrant fast-tracks to the Knesset

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Noah Slepkov is living the ultimate dream of Diaspora Jews who want to make a difference in Israel.

At age 28, the St. Catharines, Ont.-born political protégé is working as an adviser to fresh-faced Labor party member of Knesset, Einat Wilf, 39.

Slepkov landed the job just four months after making aliyah.

"I'm in a situation where I'm doing exactly what I want to be doing. I am doing things that I hoped to be doing five years down the line," said Slepkov, a self-confessed West Wing addict, from his office in the Knesset. "It's like a dream come true."

Of course, he didn't get there overnight. It took dedication and hard work – and quite a measure of good luck.

Slepkov first met Wilf when he hosted her at the University of Western Ontario (UWO) as a stop on her Israel Campus Coalition speaking tour in November 2006. After serving as program director for Hillel Vancouver and afterward as director of Jewish Student Life at the University of Toronto, Slepkov had returned to his alma mater to take a position as director of Israel and Jewish affairs at London Jewish Campus Services.

Part of his job as leader of Israel and Jewish advocacy on campus involved bringing speakers. "Einat was the most articulate Israeli speaker I had heard throughout my eight years on university campuses," Slepkov said. "She was totally inspiring, and I knew then that she was destined for greatness in Israeli politics and the Jewish world."

The pair's second meeting took place in Israel, in February 2008, when Slepkov invited Wilf to speak to a visiting group he had organized, along with the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), of 30 students from the UWO Richard Ivey School of Business. "The feedback from trip participants was tremendous," Slepkov said.

Wilf said that speaking on campuses, as well as to Jewish communities and organizations, is extremely important to her. "I believe that Israel is the target in many places of very malicious campaigns and you cannot leave the arena undefended," she added.

The pair's third meeting took place after Slepkov made aliyah in July 2008. As soon as he heard that Wilf intended to run in the Labor primaries, he sent her an e-mail with the subject line, "Put me to work."

"I told her I would love to be involved in the campaign, and I would do whatever she needed," Slepkov said.

"I really like politics. I came to Israel with the hope of getting involved in politics. For me, it would be so much more meaningful and more fun than going into politics in Canada."

Wilf, a former strategic consultant with McKinsey & Company in New York and a general partner with Koor Corporate Venture Capital in Israel, said it was Slepkov's do-anything attitude that won her over.

"The spirit of his e-mail was just great. A lot of people who are interested in politics and say they want to help don't want to make phone calls or lick envelopes. Everyone wants to be a strategic consultant. I loved the spirit with which he approached me."

At the time, Wilf was desperate for help with a monstrous Excel document, containing the contact details for the Labor party's voting members. Slepkov, an Excel guru, came to the rescue. Before he knew it, he was handling Internet marketing and communications for her campaign.

"When I saw that he was true to his word and he had ideas, I said okay. I actually need his skills," Wilf said.

"Being part of this campaign was very exciting," Slepkov said. He was particularly interested in Wilf, because if she were to win, she would have to rise above all of the so-called compulsories of Israeli political success – being an incumbent, having the support of the party chairman or another power broker and being a national celebrity. "If she was going to win, it would be purely through strategy, hard work, and dedication," Slepkov said.

Noah Slepkov and Einat Wilf

Wilf drafted Slepkov to participate in the national election campaign that followed in February 2009, for which he handled online marketing to constituents of the Labor party. He also got a taste of campaigning, travelling with Wilf across the country.

"These road trips were amazing for me, because we would have these long, serious, intense conversations," said Slepkov about his talks with Wilf, who has a PhD in political science from the University of Cambridge. "I was getting the equivalent of a PhD in Israeli politics. I learned so much from that experience."

But when the national election results came back, the Labor party didn't do as well as it had hoped, winning just 13 seats. Wilf was number 14 on the list. Slepkov watched as the election results were projected onto the Azrieli towers in Tel Aviv: first Likud, then Kadima, then Yisrael Beiteinu and finally Labor. "It was one of those screaming 'noooooo' moments," Slepko said. "It was a tremendous sense of disappointment."

Wilf then threw herself into teacher and principal meetings for her recently published book, Back to Basics: How to Save Israeli Education (at no additional cost). "Once the campaign was over, I decided to dedicate a lot of my time to meeting with teachers about the book, to try to initiate change," said Wilf, who brought Slepkov along to assist her.

She also returned to her post as a Senior Fellow at the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute. Slepkov followed her again and worked as an intern, contributing to the research and writing of the institute's "Annual Assessment" publication, an overview of the preceding year in terms of geo-political, economic, social and political developments internationally and in the Diaspora and Israel.

Meantime, Wilf was offered a teaching position at Sapir College in Sderot, which she accepted, and she asked Slepkov to be a research assistant for her course on social entrepreneurship.

"It's important to mention that he did such good work at every turn that I became very dependent on his good work, so I kept taking him with me," Wilf said.

While he worked with Wilf, Slepkov continued to pursue his master's degree in government at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya. It was there, while he was working as a teacher's assistant at a master's recitation class in research methods, that he got a mysterious SMS message from Wilf.

"I got this really bizarre text message from her saying, 'Are you following? Be ready to join me,'" recalled Slepkov. After checking the news, it all became clear. Rebel Labor MK Ophir Paz-Pines had resigned, bumping Wilf onto the Labor party list.

That evening she held a strategy session at her apartment in north Tel Aviv. "I asked her, 'What's my role in all this?'" Slepkov said, "and she said, 'You're going to do what you've always done.'"

Wilf said she got dozens of resumés in the first weeks of becoming an MK and "my answer to all the resumés was that I have had people who have been with me for the last two years, and they are the ones who will continue being with me."

Slepkov and Wilf have been working elbow to elbow in the Knesset ever since.

"Noah is a superb strategic thinker, and he's been great in terms of being a thought counterpart and a strategic-thinking counterpart, analyzing and making decisions," Wilf said.

"The other thing, of course, is the amazing work that he does on the Internet. For a politician to be able to directly talk and present themselves to their constituency, unmediated, is so important. It is making politics more approachable, more personable. It's not just a technical tool – it's a way of political thinking – and Noah has allowed me to be on the cutting edge of that."

"It's nice to work for someone who believes in you," Slepkov said.

Of course, he still faces lots of challenges as a new immigrant. Number 1 on the list? Hebrew. Slepkov gives himself five years to achieve fluency. "We're putting Noah on a Knesset ulpan," said Wilf, smiling. "He's not allowed to speak English in the Knesset."

The challenges and the hard work aside, Slepkov said it's been an extremely fulfilling ride. "I made aliyah for several reasons, the first of which is because I believe that the Jewish people should be in the Land of Israel. The fact that my family ended up in Canada is by mere chance."

On one of his first days in the Knesset, he was sitting in the cafeteria and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu walked by.

"All of a sudden, it struck me and I felt this strong connection to Jewish history," Slepkov said. "For me to be able to work in the Knesset, I feel part of this historical narrative."

Gold medal reverie at Yitzhak Rabin event

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's Heatley over to Thornton, deke, shot – oohh, great save!

The tempo picks up. The lines change. Out comes Crosby, who powers through the neutral zone, over the blue line, drop pass, shot – it's blocked.

The action is end to end. The fans are totally into it. They're cheering, encouraging their favourites to even greater heights of excellence.

Someone blows an air horn. Check that - it's a shofar.

Wait a minute. A shofar?

What, this isn't Canada-U.S.A.?

The hockey is good, but this isn't Canada Hockey Place in Vancouver. It's Rink 1 at Chesswood Arena and those colours – black versus black on one rink, white versus white on another – aren't national colours.

And that kid's got Hebrew lettering on his back. What gives?

It's time to wake up from a midday reverie, although for the kids on the ice imagining they're Crosby, Thornton, Doughty or Heatley, the one-day winner-take-all tournament is like their Olympic gold-medal game.

The fans seem to enjoy it, too. Alright, most are moms and dads, bubbes and zaydes, but the mood at the rink is festive and the players are full of emotion. The spirit is pervasive as Jewish day schools vie for top honours at the annual Yitzhak Rabin Hockey Tournament.

Thirteen teams from most of Toronto's Jewish day schools are represented at the event, named in honour of the slain Israeli prime minister.

For many kids, the tournament is a sporting highlight of the year, the culmination of a seven-week season that pitted school against school in the Jewish Day School Hockey League.

Hockey, of course, is the great Canadian cultural glue, and for kids at Jewish day schools, it's not much different.

Russell Pritchard and Errol Singer, hockey dads who've been organizing the tournament for the past five years (this is their last year), say the tournament is "a fun, social day – with kosher pizza no less."

Pritchard ventures the guess that "it's probably the largest Jewish hockey league in the world."

With 221 youngsters taking part, he may be right.

United Synagogue Day School's (USDS) Bayview and Bathurst campuses each ice teams in the junior (grades 3, 4 and 5) and senior (grades 6, 7 and 8) divisions, while Leo Baeck Day School had two teams, Associated Hebrew Schools four, Bialik Hebrew Day School two and the Toronto Heschel School one.

Buses line up to deposit players, and with school chums and family members present, some 1,000 people made their way to the rink on game day to take in the spectacle, Pritchard said.

Bialik youngsters are clearly number one after winning the junior division at day school tournament.

Though the games are competitive, organizers recognize skill levels may not be equal among all teams.

To prevent one-sided games, teams are seeded, and "over the years, we try to teach our kids to respect the other kids and not blow out the other team," Pritchard said. "We teach them derech eretz [respect]."

Mitchell Sinclair, coach of the Associated Hurricanes, a senior team, said his son enjoys the league even more than games in the GTHL. The tournament, he said, "creates great school spirit."

As for the final results, in the two-game junior division final, Bialik swept both games versus USDS Bayview 5-3 and 5-4, while Leo Baeck north claimed top honours in the senior division with a one-game 7-2 win over USDS Bayview.

Israeli peewees win Division B in Quebec tourney

Hawey, who has been involved with hockey in Quebec all of his life and has helped develop the Israeli Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF), placed the Bat Yam team in a lower-ranked division because he thought they might not be ready to play with the better teams. In fact, he feared they might not even win one game in Division B.

They weren't eligible to compete for the tournament's top trophy, the Coupe du Monde de l'Amitié, but Hawey is already thinking that may change next year. He hopes Israel will become a regular entrant in the tournament, alongside such powerhouses as Canada, the United States and Finland.

Bat Yam's captain, Mark Revniaga, scored the second-highest number of points in Division B with his 11 goals and five assists, while brothers Dan and Michael Boudnikov weren't far behind in, respectively, the fourth and fifth spots.

Hawey thinks the team greatly benefited from their coach Dima Gromkov spending two months last summer in Quebec upgrading his skills, specifically with Lévis' Midget AAA team, Les Commandeurs, something Hawey arranged.

For example, Hawey said the team showed impressive skill in killing off a penalty with just one minute and 48 seconds left in the third period of the 3-2 squeaker over Beauport.

Bat Yam has grown into an international-calibre team (it previously played in Latvia and France), despite having no arena in their town, a suburb of Tel Aviv. The players have to travel two hours to Metullah on the northern border, site of Israel's sole regulation-size ice rink.

Before returning home to Israel from Montreal, the team was given a private tour of the Bell Centre, home of the Montreal Canadiens. They were greeted by former Habs head coach Jean Perron who coached Israel's senior national team to an IIHF Division II championship in 2005 and continues to be an adviser to the IIHF.

Some of the players attended his hockey camp in Israel last summer.

Perron took the kids through the Canadiens' hallowed dressing room and took off his 1986 Stanley Cup ring to let them have a close look.

"I'm very, very proud of you," Perron said to the players. "Say hello to all of my hockey players in Israel."

"This is a big shot in the arm for hockey in Israel," said Montreal businessman Alan Maislin, past chair of the IIHF, who thinks the presence of the 21 Israeli youngsters, including two girls, in Quebec had the added bonus of showing people a different side of the Jewish state.

Outside the tournament, Bat Yam was also invited to play several exhibition games in the Quebec City area.

Team manager Victor Gokhberg, whose son Maxim is the goaltender, admitted he never dreamed the team would do as well as it did.

He said between 200 and 300 Israeli children are now playing ice hockey at the peewee level. Because of the lack of ice rinks, hockey on inline skates is far more popular, with perhaps a couple of thousand kids playing in total.

A second ice hockey arena is set to open in the southern resort of Eilat in the near future, Gokhberg said, but that's even further away from Bat Yam than Metullah.

Bat Yam's gold medal in Quebec should help generate more interest in the game among Israeli children. "Soccer and basketball are the favourite sports. Hockey is still low on the list," said Gokhberg, a native of Latvia.

The kids seemed awestruck walking through the Bell Centre, with its photos of hockey legends and displays of game memorabilia. They looked down onto the 22,000-seat arena from the dizzying heights of the press gallery and the VIP box.

Uri Benhar, 11, a left-winger who had three goals in the tournament, said he became interested in hockey while living for seven years in Raleigh, N.C., and his favourite team remains the Carolina Hurricanes.

Asked what it meant to him to be in a hockey shrine like the Bell Centre, the shy Benhar said, "It's exciting… It feels good." He added that his ambition is to play in the NHL.

In the midst of all the celebration, Hawey noted that his fundraising to cover Bat Yam's costs here was not very successful. He raised about $6,000 and needs at least another $5,000 to pay the bills. Funds are being collected through Quebec City's only synagogue, Congregation Beth Israel Ohev Shalom.

Reducing the risk of Alzheimer's

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Speakers at a recent program about women and Alzheimer's disease assured the more than 400 women – and a handful of men – in attendance that memory lapses are not the same as memory loss.

"If you can't find your keys, that is normal," said Dr. Marla Shapiro, MC of "Beat Brain Sag," sponsored by Women of Baycrest.

Also on the panel, held at the Guvernment nightclub, was the host, journalist Libby Znaimer; Dr. Tiffany Chow, a clinician-scientist at Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute, and Dr. Jean Marmoreo, a family physician who specializes in treating mid-life women.

Shapiro said that her husband worried one morning when he found her car keys in the fridge. "I put them on top of my lunch in the fridge, because I didn't want to forget my lunch. I knew I couldn't leave the house without my keys."

Memory lapses are a hormonal thing, Znaimer said, and the information does comes back. "After menopause, though, you'll find you don't care," she said with a laugh.

She told the crowd that although one in eight people will develop Alzheimer's, the statistic for women is one in six.

"Every five minutes, someone in Canada is diagnosed, and in 30 years it will be one every two minutes," Znaimer said. "In the 'zoomer' generation, there are 2.7 million people caring for someone with some sort of dementia."

Marmoreo, known as Dr. Jean, said the biggest risk factor for Alzheimer's is age. "The fastest growing segment of the population is over 80. If you have family history, you have a three-fold increased risk, and every five years, your risk doubles. By the time you're in your 80s, the risk is 33 per cent."

She stressed however, that regular, moderate activity reduces the risk. "There is nothing your body loves more than being strong. It honours you when you [strengthen] it. Anything that keeps you fit and powerful will help your brain," said Marmoreo, founder of JeansMarines, a running group that aims to get women off the couch and to the starting line of the Marines Corps Marathon in Washington, D.C., within nine months.

Znaimer added that women who do weight training twice a week scored higher in cognitive tests.

Chow said that exercise also provides a social and a self-esteem boost. "There is a correlation between low self-esteem and Alzheimer's, and there is also a risk for people who are lonely. Social interaction is very important.

"Spend time being mindful and taking take of yourself. If you take care of your vascular risk factors, you slow down the Alzheimer's risk."

She added that research has shown that decreasing one's caloric intake by 33 per cent also slows down the risk of Alzheimer's.

"[Changes from the disease] start to occur in the 40s. Good habits need to start yesterday."

Marmoreo said that there's "much more knee-jerk alarm around cancer than around Alzheimer's. The apprehension of Alzheimer's is much more subtle. We tend to keep it under cover."

ASK ELLA'S CHILI FOR A CROWD

6 lbs. lean ground chicken or beef
4 c onion, coarsely chopped
3 c green pepper, diced
2 pkgs. sliced mushrooms
1 whole garlic head, minced
4 cans red kidney beans, 19 oz/540 ml. drained and washed
3 1/2 cans tomatoes, diced, 28 oz/796 ml.
3/4 c mild chili powder
2 tbsp. cocoa powder
1 1/2 tsp. salt
2 1/2 tbsp. sugar
2 tsp. chili pepper flakes

Cook ground meat; strain any fat. Saute onion, green pepper, mushrooms and garlic just until onion is tender. In a huge pot add all ingredients except beans. Heat to boiling. Reduce heat; simmer covered 1 hr stirring occasionally. Adjust seasonings to your taste. Stir in washed beans. Cook until chili has thickened. Enjoy! Freezes well.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

THE RADOMER FRIENDLY SOCIETY

The Radomer (Rodamer) Mutual Benefit Society, seen here celebrating its third anniversary banquet, was founded in Toronto in 1925 by a group of immigrant families from Radom, Poland. Formerly headquartered on Beverley Street, the society merged in 1950 with B'nai Radom, an alternate group founded by Holocaust survivors. Today it is known as Congregation Beth Radom and operates a conservative egalitarian synagogue on Reiner Road in the Sheppard-Bathurst area of North York.

Finding a good hairstylist

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I am back in therapy. After all I am Jewish, and we are a complex people. Therapy makes sense.

A year ago, I decided it was the right time for me to return to the couch. I was in a better place and prepared to be emotionally introspective. Much of this had to do with the fact I am a father, a state-of-being that demands better mental health. Often, we ourselves are not enough of a reason.

Further, I am turning 50, becoming a junior senior, and thirsty for meaning, hungry for purpose and in pursuit of a clearer value system. I'm far more aware of what I know and don't know, and my internal chaos is workable.

Mind you, being a mess was always a good reason.

I knew it would be as difficult to find the right analyst as it is to stumble upon the correct hairstylist. Once you've found them, you rarely want to leave.

You will likely find your therapist by word-of-mouth. Listen when people discuss their therapy, ask questions, and jot down names. Personally, I wasn't concerned if he/she was a psychiatrist, psychologist, social worker, or had another designation – as long as they were superlative at the healing sport.

I met my current therapist at a baby naming. She seemed wise, aware, curious, talkative when required and quiet when needed, so I took her number and it is working out well.

A good therapist is a blessing. I am overjoyed by the bond that exists between us, as I have experienced the opposite many times. When I was younger and more unaware of my feelings, I would go through long bouts of therapy not connecting with my therapist. I figured it was me, unable to jive well emotionally. Now, however, I know that there were two people in that room, and intuitively recognize that my therapist and I were not compatible. I understand now that the professional should have sensed that and recommended we call it quits.

If you are considering going into therapy – an excellent idea – know there is a lot of mediocrity in the field. Search, search and search again.

Be aware of life coaches as anyone can become one regardless of their values and experience in life. A life coach is described as someone who is a personal expert to help you appreciate your complete potential! Coaching is very young, and full of wannabe therapists charging lots of money. And they work with you on the phone.

While there are good coaches – I had one for five years – you'll need to search hard to find them.

If you have a therapist, or are meeting one, trust your intuition and ask some basic questions. Do you have a sense you can trust him/her? Can you open up to them, lay out all the crap? Is he/she asking very significant questions? Do they seem to get you? Are they authentic? Do you sense they are working hard in that room, as they expect from you? Ask them how they think it's going.

If your guts tell you nothing is happening in that room, bring it up, give it some time – not too long – and then move on. Don't think you've failed if the first or third therapist isn't helping you and be grateful if your therapist tells you it isn't clicking.

Introspection is a mainstay of being Jewish. We are not simple folk. Take the leap. Therapy was made for us. But be vigilant and careful because a good hairstylist is hard to find.

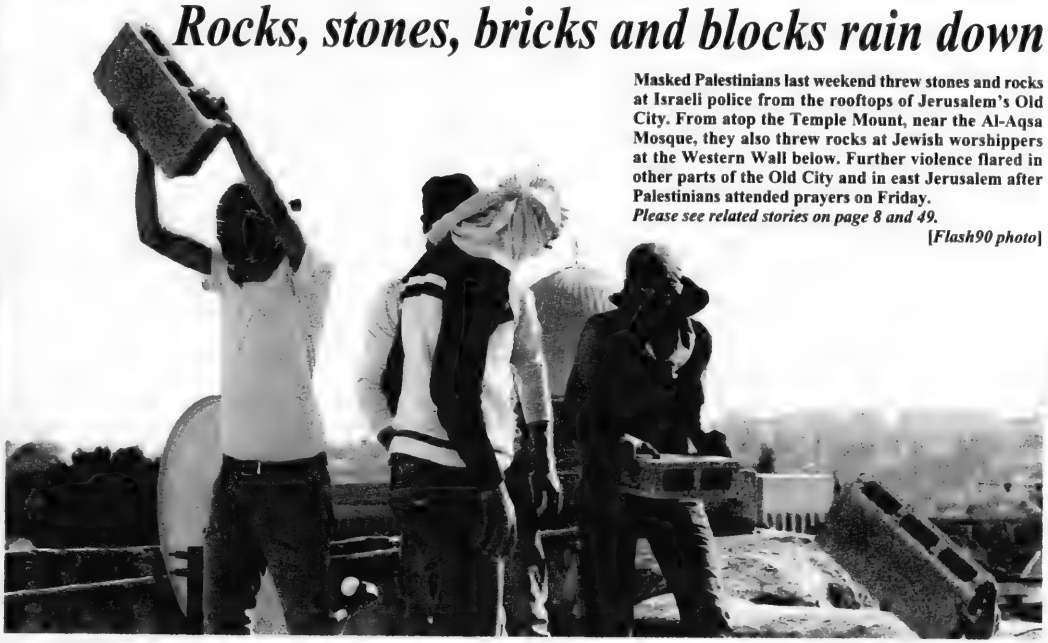
Rocks, stones, bricks and blocks rain down



Masked Palestinians last weekend threw stones and rocks at Israeli police from the rooftops of Jerusalem's Old City. From atop the Temple Mount, near the Al-Aqsa Mosque, they also threw rocks at Jewish worshippers at the Western Wall below. Further violence flared in other parts of the Old City and in east Jerusalem after Palestinians attended prayers on Friday.

Israeli firm develops airline security system

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

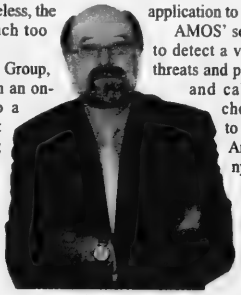
Al Qaeda operative Richard Reid was attempting to light the fuse on his shoe bomb when other passengers and crew on board American Airlines Flight 63, noticing a strange odour, tackled him and ended his attempt at terrorism.

Umar Farouk Abdulmutallab, the Nigerian Islamist known as the underwear bomber, managed to set his pants on fire before passengers jumped to their own defence and subdued him.

Travellers on both flights relied on their own resources and luck rather than on any sophisticated detection or security system to save their lives. Nevertheless, the attempts came much too close for comfort.

Enter the AMOS Group, an Israeli firm with an on-board solution to a problem that does not appear to be going away any time soon.

AMOS, which stands for Air Marshal Operational System, is developing an airline security system that would provide flight crews with an early warning about terrorist threats. It also has an application to address air rage.



Arie Raif

AMOS' solution is designed to detect a variety of terrorist threats and provide the captain and cabin crew with a checklist of options to address them, said Arie Raif, the company's vice-president.

Working in conjunction with a major player in the airline industry – confidentiality prevents Raif identifying the partner – AMOS has put together a system of sniffers, censors and video surveillance that provides pilots with real-time information about possible threats in the cabin.

The sensor system can identify suspected terrorists through minute chemical, biological or explosive residue and locate them by row number. A software system developed by AMOS then provides the captain with a list of responses that he can implement and communicate by smartphone (such as a BlackBerry or cellphone) to cabin crew, air marshals or other security personnel on board, Raif said.

The News in Brief

Canada

Asper Steps Down

WINNIPEG — Leonard Asper resigned last week as president and CEO of Canwest Global Communications, the firm founded by his late father. Israel Asper died in 2003, and the company has been forced to restructure under a crushing debt load. Leonard Asper's siblings, Gail and David Asper, resigned from Canwest's board last month. The family still owns most of its controlling shares.

New Canadian Rabbis

NEW YORK — Eight Canadians were honoured March 7 at Yeshiva University for receiving their rabbinic ordination. Natanel Javasky, Avraham Grunberger, Michael Rootman and Jeff Turtel of Toronto, along with Elie Farkas, Yitzhak Szyf and Brahm Weinberg of Montreal and Michael Goldstein of Ottawa, received smichah from Yeshiva U's Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary (RIETS). They were part of a record class of 190 men.

Former Mayor Dies

BRANTFORD, Ont. — Max Sherman, the only Jewish mayor of Brantford, Ont., died Feb. 28 in the city at age 96. Sherman served on city council from 1955 to 1957, when he was elected mayor. After his two-year term, the Toronto-born Sherman returned to private life. He served on council again two more times, from 1961-1964 and 1976-1997. Brantford City Hall's foyer is named in his honour, as is a local street.

Facility Being Built

TORONTO — Amid reports of a dramatic jump in diagnoses of Alzheimer's disease in coming years, B'nai Brith Canada said it's now building a care facility at 1 Kenton Dr. in Toronto. The land was donated by the late David Sud and his wife, Martha.

World

Farrakhan Slurs Jews

CHICAGO — Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan blamed Jews for U.S. President Barack Obama's difficulties. In a Feb. 28 speech at Chicago's United Centre on Saviour's Day, a Nation of Islam holiday, he told 20,000 followers that Obama's political problems came after he stood up to the Jewish lobby at a White House meeting last summer. He also said Jews control the U.S. Congress.

Letters Slur Jews

MADRID — Israel's embassy in Madrid received dozens of postcards from Spanish schoolchildren containing anti-Semitic messages. On Feb. 28, Israel lodged a complaint with the Spanish government charging Spanish schools are promoting anti-Semitic and anti-Israel ideas. Some of the postcards read, "Jews kill for money," "Leave the country to the Palestinians" and "Go somewhere where they will accept you." Another, addressed to Ambassador Rafi Shotz, read: "How many Palestinians have you murdered today?" Spain's ambassador to Israel said the letters aren't part of the national curriculum and appear to be a private initiative.

Zundel Released, Banned From Canada

OTTAWA — Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel was released from a German prison after serving a five-year sentence and was promptly banned from Canada.

Ernst Zundel

Zundel, 69, who was released March 1 from a prison in Mannheim, was found guilty in 2007 of inciting hatred against Jews and denying the Nazi genocide against the Jews – in 14 specific instances – on his website and in a newsletter. His five-year term included two years in jail after his deportation from Canada in 2005. His trial began in November 2006. He received the maximum sentence.

In a statement, federal Justice Minister Vic Toews said that in 2005, a Federal Court judge "confirmed that Zundel is inadmissible on security grounds for being a danger to Canada." He added that the ruling "reinforced the government's position that this country will not be a safe haven for individuals who pose a risk to national security."

Born in Germany, Zundel left there in 1958. Considered among the most active Holocaust deniers in the world, he was arrested in Canada in 2003. He was among the first right-wing extremists to use the Internet to spread hate material. Canada expelled him in 2005 after courts found his website to be unconstitutional. He was one of several Holocaust deniers deported to Germany at that time.

During his trial in Mannheim, his attorney, Sylvia Stolz, also denied the Holocaust and was herself jailed.

Toronto Paralympian heading to Vancouver

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

vancouver 2010
PARALYMPIC GAMES
JEUX PARALYMPIQUES

For some athletes, Vancouver 2010 is just getting started. This week, Canada hosts its historic first-ever Paralympic games, with more than 1,300 athletes from 44 countries.

Among the 60 members of Team Canada is newcomer Melanie Schwartz, a 24-year-old para-alpine skier.

Reaching the Olympic level has been almost as much of a surprise to the Torontonian Schwartz as it has to the people around her. Born missing half of her right leg, she tried many sports as a child, but says with a sense of wonderment that she was never particularly athletic until she was almost finished university. "Skiing wasn't anything special."

Part of the problem was that she was trying to ski like everybody else around her – on two legs.

"Originally when I started skiing, I skied on two skis and two poles and used my prosthetic leg."

She wears the prosthetic leg for most activities, and while she's very skilled, the prosthetic was far from a natural on the slopes. "I didn't have enough control of the second ski."

After she had been trying for about five years – driven by her love of the sport's speed – an instructor with Ontario Track 3 Ski Association, which teaches children and youth with disabilities, convinced her to try skiing on one leg. It took awhile to gain the skill she needed, but Schwartz quickly realized that this was her best shot at getting beyond the beginner level.

Special poles equipped with outriggers – essentially, short skis – help para-alpine skiers like Schwartz maintain essential balance without sacrificing speed and adeptness on the hills.

Though she enjoyed the sport enough to join the ski team as a student at Forest Hill Collegiate Institute, Schwartz wasn't serious about competing until her first disabled race three years ago in January 2007, when she was a computer science student at the University of Waterloo.

'Lifting up our eyes'

From the editor's desk...

As readers of this column over the past four weeks know, it has been dedicated to commemorating the 85th anniversary of the opening of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in April 1925.

The official opening ceremonies were held on the eastern slope of Mount Scopus at a makeshift amphitheatre where thousands of dignitaries, guests, visitors and onlookers gathered to mark the historic occasion.

Today, a permanent amphitheatre carved of Jerusalem stone exists on that very spot, part of the unique character of the university, a touchstone site of enduring national significance.

Rare are the ceremonies at the amphitheatre that compare to the first one there 85 years ago. One exception, of course, might be the very moving address by the then-chief of staff of the Israel Defence Forces, Yitzhak Rabin, who accepted an honorary doctorate on behalf of the men and women of the IDF after the Six Day War in June 1967. That, too, was a very poignant moment.

But on April 1, 1925, the atmosphere on Mount Scopus was heavy with anticipation. Thousands travelled to Jerusalem and squeezed onto the narrow promontory overlooking the Old City to the west and the Dead Sea to the east to participate in the ceremony as well to witness it. They knew it was to be a pivotal moment in the history of the Jewish People forged, like steel, through fire, on the anvil of two millennia of dispersion, perennial displacement and wounded wandering.

The decision to found a university had actually been taken some years earlier. Indeed the cornerstone of the university was laid in 1918.

One week before Pesach, however, on the seventh day of Nisan in 1925, the brilliant, heroic scientist and future first president of the state, Dr. Chaim Weizmann, presided over the epochal service that announced to the world, and especially to the young men and women of the Jewish homeland and beyond, that an academy of higher learning in the sciences and the humanities was now open without quota and without discrimination.

Chief Ashkenazi Rabbi of the Yishuv Rav Abraham Isaac Hacohen Kook was asked to deliver the invocation. He was vilified in certain fundamentalist circles merely for attending the ceremony, let alone for imparting remarks as well.

As was noted in an essay published by the Orthodox Union, Rav Kook viewed the occasion as the fulfilment of the words of the prophet Isaiah who proclaimed (60: 4-5): "Lift up your eyes and look around, they are all gathered together and come to you. Your sons come from afar and your daughters are on your side." Rav Kook's restatement of Isaiah's exhortation "Lift up your eyes" was doubly meaningful – not only in the sense intended by Isaiah, but also as an image of broad application, Rav Kook conveyed the essence of the university as a place "lifting up the eyes" of mankind, a place from which scholarship, learning and scientific advancement has emanated ever since its founding.

To be sure, Isaiah's words and Rav Kook's invocation can be applied to every university in Israel today. Indeed, the mission of the Hebrew University as articulated to The CJN by its president Menahem Ben-Sasson is undoubtedly, in part at least, the mission of each of Israel's universities: "service to the Jewish People and service to the world."

The soaring level of higher learning in the Jewish state is widely known and acknowledged throughout the world, despite the often malevolent mischaracterizations about Israel cast in unfriendly circles. Each Israeli university specializes in its own particular fields of research and scholarship and helps push the boundaries of human betterment to higher, deeper and further levels.

Depicting some of the unique aspects of the Hebrew University these past few weeks has been a way to emphasize this increasingly appreciated fact and, additionally, to tie the advancements in all fields of human endeavour that emanate from Israeli universities to the place of Jewish historical pre-eminence: Jerusalem.

The Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, at whose invitation The CJN visited the university last month, has helped establish for Canadians numerous pathways of intersection with the good works and research being undertaken at the university. Programs such as the Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies, the Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship, the Louis Frieberg Center for East Asian Studies, the Wilbush Patient-Centered Medical Forum, the Peter Brojde Center for Innovative Engineering And Computer Sciences and, most recently, the Institute for Medical Research Israel Canada are some of the bridges that people from Canada and Israel travel upon together for the betterment of the world.

Mount Scopus is where the Roman general Titus and his army encamped as they pitilessly burned, sacked and plundered the Jewish capital and the Temple more than 2,000 years ago. It is thus an ironic, but perhaps predetermined accent of history, that with the bold, dramatic opening of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem 85 years ago on Mount Scopus, that very spot became one of the most moving and most important symbols of the Jewish return to sovereign life. "Our sons and our daughters" have indeed come and will continue to come from afar to Mount Scopus. Isaiah would be happy and proud.

STUDENTS CHALLENGE RACISM

Students from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre in Vaughan were among the winners of the seventh annual Morley Wolfe Youth Book Competition, "Challenging Racism and Celebrating Differences," a project of Toronto Residents in Partnership (TRIP), a not-for-profit group. The contest is open to high school students who create children's books on the contest's theme. Pictured at the March 3 awards ceremony, standing from left, are the school's general studies assistant principal, Ray Buchowski; overall winner Ari Feinberg, Carli Chait, TRIP founder Morley Wolfe, English teacher Lisa Citron, and students Toreigh Sheffer and Samantha Perelgut. Pictured in front are Shane Rodak, left, and Adam Rivietz. Daniel Navy was also one of the winners.

Jewish groups help after Chilean earthquake

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ), in partnership with Masorti Olami, is among the Jewish organizations raising funds to help victims of the 8.8 magnitude earthquake that struck Chile on Feb. 27, as it did following the January earthquake in Haiti.

Although the Masorti synagogue in Concepcion, close to the earthquake's epicentre, was destroyed, the infrastructure of Chile's Jewish community overall suffered little damage. There are an estimated 16,000 Jews in Chile, mostly in Santiago, the capital.

The head of the international Masorti organization, Rabbi Tzvi Graetz, circulated an e-mail last week saying that the walls of the synagogue were cracked and the roof caved in.

The country-wide death toll from the earthquake was reported to be more than 700 as of March 1. But overall, there was less structural damage and significantly fewer deaths than in Haiti and its capital, Port-au-Prince, in January, even though the quake in Chile was much more powerful.

Chabad-Lubavitch, which has an outpost in Santiago, saw some structural damage to its building. World ORT, which runs two vocational schools in Chile, reported that damage to the Jewish community appeared to be minimal.

Unlike Haiti, one of the world's poorest countries, Chile is wealthier and much better developed.

However, noted Howard English, spokesperson for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which has set up a Chile relief fund, "there are still relief and rescue operations required, and medical treatment is needed."

Israel is in contact with its ambassador in Chile, according to Ynet, and the government sent its condolences in a statement. Israel was among the first countries to help in Haiti.

Linda Kislowicz, CEO of UIA Federations Canada – through which funds raised by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto are being funnelled – told The CJN last Thursday that she had been in touch with the shaliach in Santiago for UIAFC's affiliate, Keren Hayesod, following the earthquake.

"The community is obviously traumatized," Kislowicz told The CJN. "It doesn't appear that there's any loss of life in the Jewish community. People are living in a variety of makeshift situations. Some are in their homes, but without electricity."

She was expecting to be briefed in more detail this week. "It might be that we would play some role in helping restore the Jewish infrastructure that has been damaged. We're still gathering information… The first line [of help] would be humanitarian… for all," Kislowicz said.

"While the devastation may not be at the level of what was experienced in Haiti, the impact and trauma is nonetheless significant and demanding of our support."

As of last Friday afternoon, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto had collected $11,000 for the Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid (IsrAID), which sent a search-and-rescue team from Israel to Haiti following the January earthquake there, and was preparing to send a team to Chile as well.

The federation has collected about $1.1 million for relief in Haiti, English said last week.

In Montreal, Federation CJA has created a link on its website for online contributions to a Chilean relief fund. Proceeds will be sent to the American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, said federation spokesperson Howard Kosnick.

The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg has also established a relief fund, with money raised being sent to the Joint Distribution Committee of the Jewish Federations of North America.

Likewise, Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee has set up a fund to assist the people of Chile. Donations will be distributed through the Jewish Coalition for Disaster Relief to partner agencies that are providing crisis relief in Chile.

As well, Ve'ahavta president Avrum Rosensweig told The CJN that his organization would be prepared to respond further, as it has in other situations over the past 13 years. "We have the ability to send pharmaceuticals, and human resources [like] a doctor or a medical team, and whatever else is needed. At this point in time, the requests are not of that nature."

Mahmoud Abbas' double game

Early last week, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas called upon the international community to stop Israel from placing the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron and Rachel's Tomb in Bethlehem on its list of national heritage sites. He warned, further, that the decision by Israel could lead to a religious war. With such fulminations aired so carefully and bombastically in public, the rioting ensued immediately.

In Hebron and Jerusalem, Palestinian stone throwers were let loose and havoc ensued. As of this writing, dozens have been hurt on both sides. As recently as this past weekend Palestinians threw rocks from the Temple Mount onto Jewish worshippers at the Western Wall below. They were inspired to do so by the Friday sermon railing against the Jewish state wanting to include equally important Jewish holy shrines onto a list of Jewish heritage sites. Not surprisingly, the clashes spread from the Temple Mount to the Old City and east Jerusalem.

There is no doubt the violence by the Palestinians has been orchestrated by politicians and eagerly joined by religious authorities.

Both Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Shimon Peres emphasized that the designation of the two sites as Jewish heritage sites entailed no new administrative arrangements or altering of the administrative status quo. The Israeli leaders emphasized the designation was educational rather than administrative in nature.

But this was irrelevant to Abbas' dangerous demagogic manipulation of his people. His purpose had been achieved: to incite his proverbial "man on the street" to violence, provoke an Israeli response and point to the troubling Israeli behaviour as further proof of the impossible-to-deal-with Israeli hard line.

That U.S. Senator John Kerry, chairman of the U.S. Senate's foreign relations committee was visiting the region at the time of the clashes between Palestinian rock throwers and Israeli police was a bonus for the duplicitous PA leader. He could whine up close and directly into the ear of the visiting American dignitary.

Kerry's departure from the area was quickly followed this past weekend by the arrival of U.S. special Middle East envoy, George Mitchell for talks with Netanyahu and Abbas. Abbas agreed last week to indirect talks with Israel for a period of four months that would be mediated by Mitchell. His remonstrations against the Israeli heritage sites announcement was his craven political cover with that ever-present Palestinian "man on the street" for agreeing to the indirect talks with Israel. To complete the triadic presence of American power brokers seeking to influence events in the area, U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden arrived in Israel on Monday, also to talk about the peace process.

Abbas incites violence against Israel even as he acts as the hurt and injured victim pleading with important American intercederers trying to get the peace process that he has self-servingly stalled back on track. It is a dangerous double game that serves only to prove to most Israelis that he is not a trustworthy partner for peace.

Build allies in struggle against anti-Semitism

It is good to be reminded so forcefully that rhetoric serving no purpose other than to demonize Israel and divide Canadians will never find support in any major political party ("Ontario legislature condemns Apartheid Week," Toronto, March 4). Deliberately misleading and inflammatory language hinders meaningful debate and dialogue, standing in the way of efforts to build understanding and encourage peace.

In 1993, when I spearheaded the production of an innovative manual for Canadian students titled Antisemitism on Campus – A Handbook for Student Action, as national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, it was as a wake-up call to students and faculty across the country. Since then, many of us have continued to work hard to help make our colleges and universities more inclusive, equitable, comfortable and safe. But the rhetoric and tensions have continued to escalate, particularly during the deliberately misnamed Israeli Apartheid Week. That is why it is so important that all political parties speak out against hatred and violence against all vulnerable and oppressed groups, and, more importantly show by example how to promote and achieve human rights for all, without vilifying or demonizing the other. Let us all continue to work together to build allies in the struggle against anti-Semitism, and all other forms of racial and religious discrimination.

Pro-Israel campaign diverts from real issue

I say kudos to our students – but not because of the over-sexualized campaign known as Size Doesn't Matter, which was devised to divert attention from the real issues rather than confront them ("Pro-Israel campaign says size isn't everything," March 4).

Students deserve a lot of credit for facing the problem of anti-Semitism on campus. I applaud the great work of the students from Hasbara at York, who have dealt with this matter with courage and strength.

The measurement of success of a campaign against Israeli Apartheid Week is not how many hits sexy pictures get on a website. Community organizations have been telling us for years not to do anything that will inflame the other side or anger the uninterested Canadian people, as if we must hide our heads in shame for being Jewish supporters of Israel. The truth of the matter is that the Islamists are winning the public relations campaign. Six years of IAWs have passed and the students have been getting nothing more than training on how to sing the praises of Israel, while avoiding the issues.

IAW would wither away if...

Regarding the clever slogan to counter Israeli Apartheid Week. Size Doesn't Matter, as soon as IAW is over, the campaign should go to Israel. Israel could negotiate to return the Golan; reroute the security fence, so it doesn't include Palestinian land; really stop building settlements and begin negotiations to create a Palestinian state. Then surely Israeli Apartheid Week would wither away.

Daily minyans in Winnipeg (1)

The story "Orthodox shuls can't sustain daily minyans" (Feb. 18) leaves the impression that there are no regular Orthodox daily minyans in Winnipeg. That is not quite accurate. For almost eight years, the Chavurat Tefila Synagogue has been having twice daily minyans, seven days a week (except for Saturday evenings in the winter months). Although the synagogue had to cut back morning minyans to three or four times a week and Shabbat in January and February due to some losses and the fact some people were away on holiday, we were able to continue evening minyans (Minchah and Ma'ariv at sunset). The shul will resuming daily morning minyans by mid-March.

Regarding the story "Orthodox shuls can't sustain daily minyans," (Feb. 18), the Talmud Torah Beth Jacob Synagogue, Ashkenazi Congregation and Chabad North join together during the week for Minchah/Ma'ariv (evening) services; Sunday, Monday and Thursday at Chabad, and Tuesday and Wednesday at Talmud Torah Beth Jacob.

Oh, to be a political analyst, liberated from the bonds of truth

BY JUDEA PEARL

For the life of me, I wish I could be a professional analyst – someone who makes a living telling people what world leaders think, why they think the way they do, why what they think is not what they say and how we ought to act knowing what they truly have in mind.

The nice thing about being an analyst is that no one cares if you are right or wrong; it is the sound of your conclusions that count, not the veracity of your premises.

Take Roger Cohen, for example, and his recent New York Times column Hard Mideast Truths (Feb. 11), which a friend sent me with a grim comment: "Only [President Shimon] Peres is left of the founding leaders of Israel… Israel needs peace to survive in the long run."

Judea Pearl

Cohen is the Times columnist who spent months, perhaps years, on a tireless campaign to convince the West that the Iranian regime does not deserve our suspicion, that it can be reasoned with like any other regime and that it does not suffer from an irrational form of fanaticism. Cohen's campaign was shattered last June by the reality of the Iranian election, its brutal aftermath and the deceptive progress of Iran's nuclear capability.

One would think that an analyst who fails so miserably in reading the minds of the ayatollah would acquire some measure of humility or introspection before reclaiming an authoritative posture as a mind reader. A prudent analyst would take a year or two to examine one's premises, scrutinize one's inference-making processes or reboot one's ideology and logical machinery.

Not Cohen.

The ink is still wet on his "I erred in underestimating the brutality and cynicism of a regime that understands the uses of ruthlessness" (New York Times, June 14, 2009) and he is back with the same style of logic, same underestimating premises, same conclusion-driven inferences, to offer a brilliant solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

His solution is predictable: "It does not make sense for America to bankroll Israeli policies that undermine U.S. strategic objectives," therefore, the United States should punish Israel into action on all fronts; settlements, negotiation with Hamas, security compromises and more. But Cohen's motive has a new twist: it is all for Israel's own good, otherwise, "What then will become of the Zionist dream?"

Israelis are too dumb, so the message reads, to understand that they need peace to survive in the long run, and only New York analysts understand the urgency of this need, and only they can come up with original and innovative solutions to Israel's future. Israelis, with all their experts, historians, statesmen, peace activists, visionaries, philosophers and, yes, analysts are incapable of thinking out of the box; Cohen can, as he did on Iran.

I lament the day I chose to become a scientist. If any of my theories ever turn out to be wrong, God forbid, no journal would dare print my articles again, and all my theories would forever be suspect of dubious intentions. Not Cohen. He can twist reality at will, and readers continue to swallow his logic, axiom after axiom, lemma after lemma, as long as the conclusion harmonizes with what they wish to hear: we can fix everything – just push whatever moves.

Take Cohen's reasons for negotiating with Hamas. "The Hamas charter is vile," Cohen admits, "but the breakthrough Oslo accords were negotiated in 1993, three years before the Palestine Liberation Organization revoked the annihilationist clauses in its charter. When [former Palestinian Authority president Yasser] Arafat and [former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak] Rabin shook hands on the White House lawn, that destroy-Israel charter was intact. Things change through negotiation, not otherwise. If there are Taliban elements worth engaging, are there really no such elements in the broad movements that are Hamas and Hezbollah?"

If only I were an analyst, I would be exonerated from checking the facts, and I would be spared the embarrassment of finding that the Oslo accords were negotiated only after Arafat proclaimed, three years earlier, before the UN General Assembly in Geneva (Dec. 13, 1988) that the Palestinian National Council renounced "all types of terrorism" and had accepted Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 as a basis for negotiations (in truth, it did not, but the world heard what it yearned to hear).

Competing theories are cherished by scientists and abhorred by analysts

As an analyst, I would not need to find out that things did not exactly change through those negotiations in the 1990s – the PLO, to this very day, has not amended the annihilationist clauses in its charter, as openly admitted by Farouk Kaddoumi, a senior PLO leader, in an interview with a Jordanian newspaper (Al-Arab, April 22, 2004; also see Benny Morris' book One State, Two States for a detailed chronology).

On the contrary, an intractable Gordian knot has been created: every Westerner now believes the charter is amended; every Palestinian says it is amended but believes it is not, and every Israeli knows what Palestinians believe. Not a healthy mindset for peace negotiations.

Most importantly, as a scientist, I would be obliged to acknowledge competing theories. For example, that the blood-soaked second intifadah erupted precisely because former U.S. president Bill Clinton and Rabin did not insist on seeing an Arabic text of an amended PLO charter on the White House lawn. Their naiveté, so the theory goes, gave Arafat the illusion that as long as the West buys into his double-talk, Palestinians are exempt from doing any homework toward peace. It subsequently made Israelis doubly suspicious of Palestinian proclamations and reinforced Palestinians' delusion that they can achieve sovereignty without internalizing Israel's permanency. Cohen now hands them another reinforcement and, once again, all in the name of peace.

Competing theories are cherished by scientists and abhorred by analysts. For a scientist, such theories pinpoint experiments one must conduct and questions one needs to ask; for an analyst, they just spoil the music of the wished-for punch line.

Cohen, for example, simply "knows" that "the 'existential threat' to Israel is overplayed" – competing theories, elaborating on Israel's precarious position do not deserve his attention. The dreadful sight of 40,000 unstoppable Hezbollah rockets aimed at civilian population centres in Israel does not deserve the attention of omniscient analysts. And I purposely do not mention the Iranian nuclear threat, Cohen's specialty, or whether Israeli society can survive the dead, wounded, maimed and orphaned victims of any massive modern-day assault, because the consequences of competing David-Goliath theories are not on the moral screen of astute analysts like Cohen.

Or take Cohen's manifesto of morality: "Past persecution of the Jews cannot be a licence to subjugate another people, the Palestinians."

The competing theory, according to which Israel relentlessly seeks ways to extricate itself from an unwanted occupation, while Palestinians reject the very notion of end-of-conflict, will forever remain the province of scientists; analysts have a licence to ignore the hard evidence that pours out of Palestinian media, schools and public discourse, which spoils the music of a wished-for theory.

Oh, that I might become an analyst someday – mesmerized by wished conclusions, falling for my own conjectures and liberated from the bonds of truth.

Judea Pearl is a professor at UCLA and president of the Daniel Pearl Foundation (danielpearl.org), named after his son.

U.S. President encourages Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to shake the hand of PLO leader Yasser Arafat on the lawn of the White House on September 13, 1993 at the signing ceremony of the Oslo Accords. As the author points out, Clinton and Rabin did not insist on seeing an Arabic text of the PLO charter that Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority claimed had been amended. [RNS photo]

The value of everything

James Stockdale, a U.S. PoW in Vietnam who resisted eight years of torment, explained the source of his courage: "I never doubted not only that I would get out, but also that I would prevail in the end and turn the experience into the defining event of my life."

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Stockdale's optimism inspires. However, he doesn't see himself as an optimist. He said that the PoWs least likely to survive were the optimists, because "they were the ones who said, 'We're going to be out by Christmas.' And Christmas would come, and Christmas would go… And they died of a broken heart."

Ironically, Stockdale was optimistic about the long-term future, yet pessimistic about the short term. Business consultant Jim Collins labelled Stockdale's views the Stockdale Paradox.

This paradox resembles Maimonides' views on the Messiah. To Maimonides, the Messiah is a fundamental belief, yet, at the same time, Maimonides, wary of the destruction brought by false Messiahs, forbids speculation about when the Messiah will arrive. Much like the Stockdale Paradox, Maimonides demands that we dream of the Messiah, yet he discounts any possibility of the Messiah's imminent arrival.

At the heart of these paradoxes is a riddle about optimism. Optimism has two definitions: being content ("The glass is half full"), and hoping for a better future ("It'll all turn out for the best"). These two definitions are dramatically different. One reflects acceptance of one's circumstances. The other reflects a desire for change. "Optimism" is itself a paradox, because it demands us to dream of a better future while being happy with our present situation!

However, accepting both definitions of optimism is not illogical. An optimist sees the value in everything. Of course the optimist dreams of a better life. But the optimist also knows how precious life always is, and that even the torments of a PoW camp can become the defining moments of one's life.

It's not easy to embrace the value of everything. Rabbi Israel Spira was a Holocaust survivor who taught and inspired thousands until his death in 1989. In March 1945, he learned that he had lost his entire family. Overwhelmed by despair, he walked up to the electrified fence at Bergen Belsen in order to end it all. A woman, witnessing this, called to the rabbi: "How can you stand here now and think of ending your life? God will bless you once more… And besides, the world needs you!"

Rabbi Spira stepped away from the fence. Even in pain, even when dreams seem impossible, the optimist knows that his first duty is to live each day and see the value in everything.

Students, legislators stand up for Israel

With many people justifiably worried about the constant attempts to delegitimize Israel on college campuses, especially in Canada, we should highlight some successes.

Recently, we have seen that being creative, passionate and edgy can help reframe the conversation about Israel. The key is to be clever, not defensive, and to master your own particular strategic terrain.

Gil Troy in Montreal

In early February, McGill University students mobilized against an unfair and misleading resolution being proposed by their student society. There has long been an unspoken ceasefire on the McGill campus, with both pro-Palestinian and pro-Israeli forces holding their fire, being more committed to the tradition of civility on campus – and, frankly, to the more academic atmosphere overall. A year ago, pro-Palestinian forces broke this deal, by proposing a resolution condemning Israel's Gaza operation. Pro-Israel students mobilized and voted it down at the student society's General Assembly.

Last Passover, pro-Palestinian forces became even more aggressive, planting 1,415 Palestinian flags and 13 Israeli flags in the central green space on campus, supposedly representing the disproportionate death toll during Israel's Gaza operation. This dramatic display sought to politicize the entire campus environment.

The administration should never have allowed this break with tradition, which threatens to have every other group try similar antics. I have no desire to come to work and be bombarded by one undergraduate attempt after another seeking to dramatize whatever issue is trendy one season or the next.

Undeterred, the pro-Palestinian forces this year cooked up a seemingly harmless resolution demanding McGill invest ethically, which actually was a one-sided resolution targeting Israel. Although the General Assembly votes only on the "be it resolved" clauses, two "whereas" clauses singled out Israel for special opprobrium. This was an attempt to get the many people who support ethical investing to condemn Israel implicitly. Pro-Israel – and pro-civility – forces rejected these unfair terms. At the General Assembly, they voted down the two offensive (and historically inaccurate) "whereas" clauses, then passed the resolution.

Similar out-of-the-box thinking shaped a controversial web-based ad campaign, launched by the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students. Critics have called the "size doesn't matter" video crude, vulgar and sexist. It is certainly crude and vulgar; I'm not sure if it's sexist. But it's also funny, attention-grabbing and speaks to college students in their language, with their sensibility. We want to speak to the "more than 80 per cent of students on a given campus who haven't made up their minds about Israel and the Middle East," one of the project's creators, Noah Kochman explained. The video, which received more than 18,000 hits in its first few days, is a lure to get students learning facts about Israel.

As a professor, I wish my students got references to Aeschylus and Agamemnon. But if I want to be understood, I have to speak about Michael Jackson and Tiger Woods. Similarly, it would be great to live in a G-rated world, but our students live in an R-rated one. Kochman and his team shrewdly recognized that and spoke that language.

In a far more respectable vein, Peter Shurman, a Progressive Conservative legislator in the Ontario provincial legislature, refused to be passive in the wake of the anti-Israel week targeting campuses. Explaining that resolutions in the legislative assembly "do one thing only: they send a message, moral suasion pertinent to any given subject," he proposed a resolution regarding something "I am passionate about" in late February. Shurman rose in chambers on Feb. 24, proclaiming: "I move that in the opinion of this House, the term Israeli 'Apartheid Week' is condemned as it serves to incite hatred against Israel, a democratic state that respects the rule of law and human rights, and the use of the word 'apartheid' in this context diminishes the suffering of those who were victims of a true apartheid regime in South Africa." The resolution passed unanimously – and was applauded worldwide.

Edmund Burke famously noted, "All that is necessary for evil to succeed is that good men do nothing." These examples show that when good people do something, evil can be defeated, or at least, rebuffed.

Women of the Wall, Part II

One year ago, I wrote about my experience with Women of the Wall on Rosh Chodesh Adar in Jerusalem: the rage I experienced coming from the men's side, the fear from the women's side, and my own disheartenment while praying with this group of sincere women at Judaism's holiest site.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Jerusalem

One year later, again on Rosh Chodesh Adar, I went to the Wall to pray with them. This time, there were close to 200 women gathered there, as since the November arrest of Nofrat Frenkel for the "crime" of wearing a tallit, the monthly prayer sessions have grown larger and larger in support of the idea that any Jew should be able to pray at the Kotel as they wish. This time, there was a large contingent of Masorti kids from the Israeli Conservative youth movement flanking us on either side.

This time, many male supporters came and stood on the men's side nearest the mechitzah, forming a sort of protective barrier between us and the men climbing on chairs to scream and curse at us. (For Adar, the screamers brought a bullhorn so we could hear them call us "Amalekites" more clearly.)

This time, we were protected not only by male police, but also by male army officers called in to help when haredi women tried to aggressively break us up by entering the tightly knit group and physically pushing us out of the plaza. How odd it was to be praying behind a row of bare-headed male soldiers in the women's section. When the haredi women became vocally abusive, shrieking at us (apparently we are Christian lesbian Reform blasphemers), we kept on singing Hallel. It was Purim shpiel meets Mahatma Gandhi.

No matter how much detractors claim the Women of the Wall come only to provoke, let's be honest: the very presence of a large group of interdenominational women being spiritual in a way that differs from the haredi "protectors" of the Wall is provocative.

And this time, I felt as if my community and my colleagues were there with me. I was able to speak for a few moments publicly to the 200 women gathered (and to Frenkel, who was leading the service) and let them know about the full-page ad signed by 29 rabbis that appeared in this paper, and the event that took place in Toronto on Rosh Chodesh Adar in support of religious freedom. All those gathered deeply appreciated Toronto taking a lead, and I suggested to the rabbinical students gathered and to the guests from abroad that they take this idea from Toronto and spread it.

Thank you, Toronto, for understanding the depth of this issue. This is not about whether you or I "want" to wear a tallit at the Wall. It's not a personal matter of Frenkel or Anat Hoffman, director of the Israel Religious Action Center, who was arrested in January for wearing a tallit at the Wall. It's about the soul of Israel, about Israel being a light unto the nations, about Israel being a democratic country of all her citizens, and about Israel being a Jewish homeland for all Jews to practise their Judaism freely.

It struck me that when we read from the Megillah this past Purim about the threat of women not obeying their husbands, and the sarcastic decree that went forth from Achashverosh commanding each man to be king in his castle after Vashti refused to be degraded, we really read about the way society perceives the power of women as a national and cosmic threat. Instead of seeing the Women of the Wall as a sincere group of ohavei haShem, some of our brothers and sisters see us only as a threat to the system.

Would that they could hear the Megillah as a mocking critique of this kind of drunken, irrational fear of women gathering and expressing their humanity, not as a justification for it.

The Kirshner File

Lieberman cuts a swath across foreign policy

Pugnacious, combative and outspokenly nationalistic, Avigdor Lieberman marks his first anniversary as Israel's foreign minister this month, determined as ever to create a muscular Israeli foreign policy. A rough-and-tumble Soviet-born and bred politician whose constituents are mainly Russian Jewish immigrants, he defiantly marches to his own drummer. "I've always been controversial because I offer new ideas," said Lieberman, who recently became the first Israeli foreign minister in 20 years to visit Africa after a groundbreaking trip to Latin America, which has not been high on Israel's diplomatic agenda.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Lieberman acquired his plum job despite an ongoing police investigation against him over suspicions of bribery, money laundering, fraud and breach of trust. The prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, tapped him for the post after his right-wing Israel Beiteinu party won 15 Knesset seats and thus held the balance of power in the Knesset following last February's general election.

Dispensing with the niceties of diplomacy, Lieberman broke the mould in his inaugural public speech as foreign minister.

Only a day after U.S. President Barack Obama said that peace in the Middle East can be achieved if Israel and the Palestinians are open to compromise, he sent shock waves across the region by declaring that his government was not bound by the Annapolis peace process, which was conceived by the United States and envisaged a two-state solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Although the November 2007 Annapolis conference proved to be nothing more than an elaborate photo op, the actual Annapolis process was a high-minded exercise, setting out realistic parameters for final status talks on core issues based on the 2003 "road map" peace plan.

But with the formation of Netanyahu's right-of-centre government, and with Lieberman claiming that talks with the Palestinians had reached "a dead end," Annapolis, for all intents and purposes, was rendered irrelevant.

Although Lieberman professed to be committed to the "road map," which he originally opposed, he has ventured away from it.

In a repudiation of the 1990s Oslo spirit, he has lambasted "the "peace industry" as a waste of money and asserted that "slogans" such as the two-state solution and the land-for-peace formula have deteriorated into cliches tailored for headlines.

According to Lieberman, the way forward is to ensure security for Israel and to improve the economy of the Palestinians, thereby achieving stability for both.

Lieberman, a resident of the West Bank settlement of Nokdim, believes that the dispute with the Palestinians is not about Israel's occupation and its network of settlements, but about the Palestinians' refusal to recognize Israel's existence and legitimacy.

And lately, he has described the conflict as a religious one.

Speaking glowingly of the "Cypriot model" as a possible template for resolving the conflict, he calls for an exchange of territory and population. Under his proposal, Israel would annex settlement blocs in the West Bank, while Arab towns adjacent to the border would be incorporated into a Palestinian state. The remaining Arab citizens of Israel would sign a loyalty oath or lose their right to vote.

Lieberman's plan is not meant to be implemented any time soon. A dyed-in-the-wool pessimist who thinks that only a long-term intermediate agreement is attainable and that returning to the pre-1967 borders is a non-starter, he discounts the possibility that a comprehensive accord can be reached in less than 20 years.

As he put it recently, "Even if we return the last grain of sand, and divide Jerusalem, and agree to all the [Palestinian] demands, nothing will change and we will be in the same situation."

He doubts whether diplomatic progress can be made unless the Palestinian Authority confronts terrorism and assumes control of the Gaza Strip, which was seized by Hamas, an Islamic organization dedicated to Israel's destruction. "Without these, it will be difficult to move forward," he has observed.

Lieberman is of the view that Israel, having displayed goodwill by accepting the principle of a two-state solution, reducing the number of roadblocks in the Palestinian areas and declaring a 10-month partial building moratorium in the West Bank, has emptied its "arsenal" of gestures to the Palestinian Authority. The onus is now on the Palestinians to make reciprocal gestures, he says, having warned the Palestinian Authority that the moratorium will be followed by a renewal of "full force" building.

At the end of the day, Lieberman simply does not trust the Palestinian leadership, claiming that it supports and sponsors much of the global campaign to smear and delegitimize Israel. In addition, he claims that the Palestinian Authority is playing an "ugly" and "double game" with Israel: "During Operation Cast Lead [in Gaza in 2008 and 2009], the Palestinian Authority pressured us to crush Hamas. Then, a month later, they submitted a complaint against us to the International Criminal Court in The Hague."

His position on Syria is also unwavering.

Last month, after Syrian President Bashar Assad claimed that Israel was leading "the region into war," he warned Assad that Syria would be defeated in a future war and that "your family will no longer be in power."

Aghast by Lieberman's bellicose comments, Defence Minister Ehud Barak urged Syria to resume talks with Israel instead of trading harsh words.

Lieberman opposes a resumption of negotiations with Syria, which were formally broken off by Damascus after Israel invaded Gaza.

Unlike his most recent predecessors, Lieberman does not believe that an Israeli pullout from the Golan Heights – which Israel captured in the Six Day – will yield peace with Syria. "We will not agree to withdraw from the Golan," he said last spring. More recently, he declared, "Syria must understand that it has to let go of the demand for the Golan."

He scoffs at the notion that Turkey – Israel's oldest Muslim ally – should resume its role as a mediator in Israel's talks with Syria. He argues that Turkish "slurs" directed at Israel by its prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, have effectively disqualified Turkey. "We approach Turkey with respect and appreciation," Lieberman has said of Israel's pivotal relationship with Ankara. But two months ago in Jerusalem, Turkey's ambassador to Israel was publicly humiliated by Lieberman's rash deputy, Danny Ayalon, in a bizarre and asinine incident.

Lieberman's ties with Egypt are equally testy, due to belligerent remarks he made before his tenure as foreign minister. In 1998, he called for the bombing of the Aswan Dam in retaliation for Egypt's support of Yasser Arafat, the then-president of the Palestinian Authority. Two years ago, piqued over Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak's refusal to visit Israel, Lieberman said, "He can go to hell." As a result, the Egyptian foreign minister has boycotted him.

Lieberman, having compared Iran to Nazi Germany, has recommended that efforts to curb Iran's nuclear ambitions should be subject to a tight deadline. During a introductory meeting with Canada's foreign minister last June, he called for tougher sanctions against Iran. Last week, he called for unilateral U.S. sanctions on the Islamic republic.

Though he regards the United States as Israel's best friend, he wants to move away from "a lone dependence" on Washington and cultivate closer relations with Russia, which he considers "a strategic partner." Lieberman's bilateral dealings with the United States have been tense. In his sole trip to Washington, he and U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton clashed over Israel's settlements in the West Bank.

To some Israelis, Lieberman is like a breath of fresh air, calling a spade a spade. To most Israelis and non-Israelis, however, he is a polarizing figure who belittles the peace process and territorial compromise, needlessly provokes neighbours and further isolates Israel.

School libraries cautioned about book

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

York Region's school board is advising its administrators and teacher-librarians that a book about Palestinians and Israelis available to junior high students should be supported by "facilitated discussions" to avoid discrimination and the expression of bias.

The advisory suggests that students borrowing The Shepherd's Granddaughter as part of the Red Maple reading program should be given "a historical context and balanced perspective of both sides of the conflict that will help students understand and appreciate the sensitive aspects of the novel."

The book, distributed to school libraries across Ontario, is recommended for children in grades seven and eight by the Ontario Library Association (OLA). The Red Maple program is a voluntary after-school activity in which students can choose five of 10 recommended books and later rate them.

The Shepherd's Granddaughter, by Canadian author Anne Laurel Carter, prompted a mailing from Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center cautioning libraries that the book offers "a one-sided view of the Middle East conflict that cannot be simplified in the manner that it is presented. We are extremely concerned this over-simplification of a complicated matter has clear potential to incite hatred and violence against Jewish and Israeli students."

References to Israelis in the book generally portray them as malevolent. The Wiesenthal Center cited two examples. In one, a Palestinian character said of Israelis: "Innocent? No Israeli is innocent. Why should we let them live in peace? They don't deserve it."

A second reference has an Israeli soldier saying: "No Palestinian boys in city. We shoot Palestinian boys."

Board recommends facilitating discussions

Wiesenthal Center president Avi Benlolo said he would prefer if the book was made unavailable to students. "The Simon Wiesenthal Center does not promote censorship, but the issue is that this book is so skewed and so overtly against the State of Israel. It's fictional, yet it circulates without any kind of background. We find despicable and horrendous that it is allowed in this way. Any school child who reads the book will grow to hate the State of Israel and possibly the Jewish people."

The organization issued a memorandum cautioning educators about the book. It stated "the Ontario Library Association's choice to include the Palestinian viewpoint without Israeli representation is irresponsible and in direct violation of its mandate to promote the 'health and growth of a free society.' In addition, the one-sided fictionalized presentation of such an emotionally charged issued does not 'maintain the right of intellectual freedom,' but will inevitably provoke an emotional response, which is clearly not in keeping with the association's mandate to promote intellectual freedom."

Shelagh Paterson, executive director of the OLA, said the book allows students to "explore difficult subject matter, whether you agree or disagree.

"Many schools and parents participate in kids reading experience. It gives them the opportunity for open discussion in a safe environment" and to "stretch thinking."

Paterson acknowledged that The Shepherd's Granddaughter is more controversial than other offerings this year, but said it served to "challenge the reader to explore ideas that are controversial."

She said the committee that selected the 10 Red Maple books "looked at the literary quality, structure, richness of language, clarity, themes and content." In addition, the selections had to have been published in the last year.

Responding to suggestions that two books offered by the OLA in the last four years both portrayed Israelis is a negative light – in 2006, the York Region School Board removed Three Wishes from its libraries while the Toronto District School Board restricted access to children who had parental permission to borrow it – Paterson said "we're not trying to deliberately inflame or offend. That's not the intent."

Sarah Burakowski, a special education resource teacher in York Region who alerted the Wiesenthal Center to the book, said The Shepherd's Granddaughter is too one-sided to be showcased in the Red Maple program.

"I found that it presented a very negative image of Israel and provided little context for young readers about a conflict that is beyond their understanding. I found the book to be slanted and biased, and found it created a negative attitude about Israel and its people," she said.

Burakowski believes there are many other good books by Canadian authors on controversial subjects that could have been promoted for the Red Maple program, including one about the genocide in Uganda. That book "is not biased because it gives both viewpoints… There are other areas of history that don't focus on Israel and the Palestinians," she added.

Ross Virgo, spokesperson for the York School Board, said the board issued its memorandum because "we are deeply committed to providing an equitable learning environment free from bias and discrimination."

That criterion must be taken into account when selecting learning resources, he added.

Families celebrate Pesach in 1800s style

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

Toronto artist Vivian Reiss and her family are going to recreate a Canadian Jewish Passover seder, circa 1822, at the Campbell House Museum.

The March 29 event is the second private seder the Reiss-Gartens will be hosting for relatives and close friends in the historic building. Originally located in the town of York, the house was moved to downtown Toronto in 1972.

Reiss has showcased her paintings in over 50 shows in Canada and worldwide. Her art can be found in private and corporate collections in more than 15 countries, including the Canadian embassies in Washington, D.C., and Paris. Her talents go beyond the canvas, as she has designed architectural projects, costumes, clothing and furniture.

This Passover, Reiss, whose creativity also extends to cooking (she is currently writing a cookbook), will prepare a candlelight supper, featuring a traditional seder menu meant to emulate the experience of the first Jewish settlers in York. The meal will be cooked in the museum's wood oven and open fire, using time-honoured tools such as a cast iron cauldron and frying pan.

Reiss says the museum's rustic kitchen will let her share her fascination with the history of Passover in old Toronto with the 15 guests who will attend the seder. After having a birthday party a few years ago at Mackenzie House, a historic building and museum in Toronto, where she learned to cook on a hearth, Reiss joined the Culinary Historians of Ontario and became interested in ancient Jewish cooking rituals.

"This all coincided with the summer before when I visited a small town in Italy, where a community of Jews once lived," says Reiss. "I came across this ancient matzah oven and wanted to recapture what a seder would have been like back then."

Reiss says the seder will also be an opportunity for her to express her passion for the arts through the colourful dishes she will serve. The menu includes a bright canary pudding infused with lemon; rosemary lamb shanks in a vibrant wine sauce; purple and orange yams alongside red and yellow beets, and toasted homemade marshmallows.

Due to popular demand, Reiss will be making her famous chicken soup with matzah balls – her claim to fame as a Jewish mother, she says. "The soup will boil away in a beautiful brass cauldron, complementing the colours of the carrots, parsnip and chicken itself. Everything becomes golden."

Culinary-wise, cooking at Campbell House will be quite complicated, says Reiss, who finds satisfaction in the challenge. "There's no electricity in the kitchen. We have to bring in big washtubs of water to cook with. It's hard to control the heat in the brick oven, and it takes two hours to reach the desired temperature. It gets to about 540 degrees, so the dynamic energy of the fire and the smoky taste it brings to the food make the experience fantastic. It's seder cooking by candlelight."

To make the meal even more authentic, Reiss plans to set the table with cutlery from the 1800s that she's collected over the years from antique markets. To give the seder a personal touch, she will use horseradish from her garden for the bitter herbs course and fennel seeds she has grown for her sweet matzah recipe.

Reiss says Passover has always been her favourite holiday, as it revolves around family getting together and sharing special customs. While she has previously enjoyed cooking for her loved ones in her own home, she says the Campbell House seder further allows her to reflect on her roots.

Her parents were Hungarian immigrants, and she was raised in New York. She says at the seder her family will be reminded of their own exodus through experiencing what life might have been like for the first Jews who made their journey to Toronto.

"Passover is about exodus. It's about the immigrant experience," says Reiss. "Passover is the most meaningful holiday to my family, as every year our table is filled with Holocaust survivors, their children and grandchildren. The Passover meal, especially matzah, is symbolic of the Jewish immigrant experience."

Much like the Jews who only had time to prepare matzah after fleeing Egypt, those who immigrated to Montreal, Quebec City, New York and the town of York faced a similar predicament on Passover, Reiss says. They arrived to a strange land and had to fend for themselves, without ready-made provisions such as the manufactured goods sold in stores today.

Reiss will be taking her journey back in time with her husband, Irving Garten, her daughter, Ariel, and her son, Joel, and other guests.

Righteous Gentiles get posthumous honours

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

Gabriella Starker-Saxe and Marek Zakrzewski had never met before last week, but their stories are remarkably similar. Both are Canadian descendants of Holocaust-era heroes, and both remember hearing their forebears say that their exploits were nothing special.

"She never talked about it," said Starker-Saxe of her grandmother, Irma Uranyi, as she wiped away a tear. "My mother did, though, and the attitude was, 'You did the things you had to do. You did what was normal.'"

Zakrzewski nodded in agreement. His father, Zbigniew, "did what was tradition – normal and natural. He said it was human responsibility. He did not say he was a hero."

Yad Vashem, Israel's official Holocaust memorial and museum, respectfully disagreed, and last week, conferred posthumous Righteous Among the Nations status on Zbigniew Zakrzewski and Irma Uranyi for having risked their lives to rescue Jews during World War II.

They now enter the rarefied company of nearly 23,000 other non-Jews from 44 countries who have been so honoured by Yad Vashem and the Israeli government.

Starker-Saxe, from King City, Ont., and Marek Zakrzewski, who lives in Vancouver, were presented with certificates and specially struck medals by Israel's consul general in Toronto, Amir Gissin, and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

Also on hand for the moving ceremony in Toronto was Yacov Fliegmann, flown in from Israel by El Al airlines, who was rescued in wartime Budapest by Irma Uranyi.

In the fall of 1944, following the murder of his father, Fliegmann, then 13, arrived in Budapest from Transylvania with his mother and seven-year-old sister, Yehudit. One day, his mother went out to search for food without wearing the yellow Star of David. She never returned.

Yacov placed his sister in an orphanage, where he soon joined her. But he fled when an order came for all Jewish boys aged 12 and over to be rounded up for forced labour in Germany. After a few days dodging authorities on the bombed-out streets, Yacov found refuge in a building managed by Irma Uranyi, where she lived with her mother and daughter. Irma's husband, a convert to Judaism, had been sent to a forced labour camp.

Irma fed and sheltered Yacov until Budapest's liberation in January 1945 by Soviet troops. She died in 1993, humble and taciturn to the end, said her granddaughter.

Meanwhile, Zbigniew Zakrzewski was honoured as Righteous for having saved the life of Brunia Rubinovitch, who escaped from the Warsaw Ghetto at the age of 10 after her parents were murdered there. She made her way to the home of her parents' non-Jewish friends, the Wolskis, who were worried for her safety because the neighbours knew Brunia was Jewish.

Brunia was shuttled to a relative of the Wolskis, who in turn sent the girl to another relative, Zbigniew Zakrzewski, an upper-class Pole whose uncle had been Poland's prime minister after World War I, and his son, Marek. Zbigniew prepared Aryan papers for Brunia, gave her a Christian name and registered her at a Catholic school.

Zbigniew looked after Brunia as though she was his own daughter, and she regarded him as a devoted father.

But at war's end, Zbigniew was arrested by the Soviet secret police for his membership in an underground resistance movement against both the Nazis and Communists. He was sentenced to death.

Brunia, by now 14, wrote an impassioned letter to the president of Poland, begging for mercy for her saviour (the letter was read aloud by a student at Milton District High School. About 20 students who study the Holocaust attended the ceremony).

The president was unmoved, and in March, 1947, Zbigniew Zakrzewski was executed in a jail in Lodz. His burial site is still unknown.

Brunia made her way to Israel, but was unable to travel to Toronto to witness the honouring of her rescuer.

Wolf and Joseph Lebovic

Men raised in the haredi educational system do so from their childhood with a full-time focus on learning the Talmud and halacha, Jewish law. From an early age, school hours are lengthened to enable this intense focus to become the norm. With this dedication of learning comes a strict adherence to haredi cultural norms that are not always the norms of mainstream Israel – essentially no mixing of men and women except within the family; standards of dress that reinforce modesty and make the individual identifiably haredi, and a willingness to dedicate oneself to spiritual pursuits at the expense of one's material well-being.

While the haredi educational system prepares them for a life of Torah scholarship and promotes analytical thinking, it does not necessarily provide the training needed for gainful employment in mainstream Israeli society.

And, while haredim value large families as an expression of a mitzvah from the Torah, as families grow, expenses grow. Despite a modest monthly stipend, the burdens on the wife grow as she tries to meet material needs, and financial troubles often begin, trapping many haredim in poverty.

That's where the new Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Shachar Employment Program comes in.

A project of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), with which UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has a strong relationship, the employment program that bears the Lebovic name will enable 2,000 haredi men to lead their families out of poverty to success through employment. It will also make their transition to the working world "safer" in terms of Haredi cultural codes.

"As a member of the American Joint Distribution Committee, I was told about a number of projects that they were seeking funding for, and I was moved, in particular, by the plight of haredi men," explained Joseph Lebovic. "These are men who are committed to spending their lives studying Torah; and it's not just so that they can learn, but it's so that they can keep connected and in touch with the life they have chosen. Unfortunately, their studying of the Torah doesn't lead to employment. While they receive a stipend from the government, it's not enough to support a family."

While the program was started as a pilot, it proved its worth almost immediately, taking off quickly due to the needs of employers and the needs of haredim.

"The haredi community is not monolithic," explained Solly Kaplinsky, executive director, Overseas Joint Ventures, JDC. "While some sectors really insist upon full-time learning 'forever', others accept that it is a proper way to begin married life, but that eventually one will have to transform into work. As graduates of the haredi educational system, men have often gained excellent analytical skills, but lack basic credentials for employment such as English, mathematics and computer skills."

Thus, when finding a job is absolutely vital to meet their burgeoning financial responsibilities, it is not easy for haredi men to transition quickly while, at the same time, giving up the income of the Kollel stipend. It is often a very difficult choice to make.

The Lebovic gift of U.S. $500,000 will enable 2,000 haredi men to gain the training and education needed to find more lucrative jobs. The American Joint Distribution Committee will secure matching dollars for the program, which will go to prepatory education and skills courses, on the job training, food, monthly salaries, and much more.

The gift from the Lebovics will also benefit the haredim in the following ways:

- It will provide program participants with immediate monthly salaries well above their stipends, reducing the financial pressure on their families.
- It brings together haredi men with Israelis from other sectors of society at work allowing them to interact with each other.
- It will encourage non-haredim to appreciate the haredim as individuals making a positive contribution to Israel.

"It's very important that these men have the chance to learn job skills in a place that is run by other haredi men; a place where they have the proper food required, a place where they are comfortable, as haredi men," said Joseph Lebovic. "This is absolutely vital to their well-being, and I'm glad that we are able to provide this atmosphere where they can transition more easily."

"The vision and compassion displayed by Joseph and Wolf Lebovic never ceases to amaze me," said Ted Sokolsky, CEO and president, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "While their generosity has helped reshape the Jewish community across the Greater Toronto Area with their gifts to Mount Sinai and the Tomorrow Campaign among many, many others, their commitment to tzedakah and tikkun olam knows no boundaries. Through their gift to the JDC, these men and their families will benefit greatly not only financially, but in terms of their peace of mind."

Peel officer killed in car crash

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Peel Region police officer who died in a car crash while on duty started life in Moldova and immigrated to Israel as a young man.

Artem (James) Otchakovski never lost his love of nature and the outdoors, which he brought with him from Moldova, said Crissy Samuel, a longtime friend.

Otchakovski, 36, was killed March 2 when his cruiser struck a light standard in Brampton while en route to assist another officer. His car collided with another vehicle before hitting the lamp post. He was the first Peel police officer in 25 years to be killed while on duty.

Otchakovski, who lived in Barrie, was born in Kishinev, but made aliyah in his teens. He lived in Eilat, where he trained as a chef and worked in the hospitality industry. But Otchakovski never felt comfortable in Eilat's desert climate after growing up in a temperate area with mountains and forests, Samuel said.

Artem Otchakovski at a happy moment

At age 20, he left Israel for Canada, "his dream destination." Samuel and her ex-boyfriend had met Otchakovski in Israel, and her onetime boyfriend asked her to "help James out when he came to Canada," she recalled.

"He was 20 years old, but he was a very old soul, very European, very much into the outdoors, hunting and fishing," she said.

Otchakovski was a bird-watcher and back in Moldova, he kept a pet owl. He went on long hikes and despite his love of birds, in Canada he was an avid pheasant hunter. "He was a very atypical Jew," she said.

He was also very focused. "Once he got his papers and was able to work legally, he woke up and said he'll get a job today."

His first job in Canada was as a chef at the Wildfire Steakhouse on Yonge Street and later at Buonanotte, a restaurant at Davenport and Avenue roads.

The Barrie Examiner reported Otchakovski was known around his station for handing out recipes and teaching young officers how to cook.

"He's going to be very missed," said his colleague, Sgt. Paul Dhillon. "It's going to be a big loss. Right now, the [other] officers are having a very, very difficult time."

After leaving the restaurant business, Otchakovski took a job for an insurance company and from there moved to Brink's, where he worked for 10 years. It was at Brink's that he met his wife, Erin. They were married four years ago and have a three-year-old son, Owen.

"They're trying to cope, and we're trying to help them cope with it, but it's a life-altering experience," Peel police Chief Mike Metcalf told a news conference. "Obviously, Erin will never get over this."

Samuel, a longtime close friend, recalled "it was James' dream to become a police officer in Canada… He had a huge respect for policing. He thought it was a physical job, which he liked."

Although both his parents are Jewish, "he was not brought up in a typical Jewish home. He was raised in a very secular manner. He considered Judaism more of a nationality." Growing up, he heard stories of the Holocaust from his grandmother, who was a survivor of Nazi camps, Samuel said.

At the end of his life, everything seemed to be falling into place for him. He was happily married, had a son, he had just acquired a new bird dog and he anticipated bringing his mother to Canada from Germany within the year.

"He packed a lot into 36 years," Samuel said.

A full police funeral will be held this week.

A trust fund in support of Otchakovski's family has been established with TD Canada Trust. Donations can be made at any TD Canada Trust branch. Cheque or direct deposits should be made out to "In Trust for the Family of James Otchakovski." The account number is 0159-6529108.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

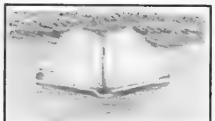
The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Checking in, six months later

By RABBI ILYSE GLICKMAN

You may not know this, but there are many people out there who not only celebrate their birthdays, but their "half-birthdays" as well. This is the calendar date precisely six months after their actual date of birth. While I don't do this myself, I do something fairly similar around the time of year in which we presently find ourselves.



Rabbinic Reflections

Every year between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, Jews around the world contemplate their behaviour and actions, and seek reconciliation, forgiveness and peace between themselves and others and with God. The Yamim Nora'im are a time for us to sever the shackles that keep us bound, and to deeply and wholly examine who we are, who we wish to be and what we hope to accomplish in the coming year. While some call them Jewish New Year resolutions, thesepromises and oaths are made publicly and privately. This is a time for tshuvah, a turning to good things, good thoughts and good actions.

But what happens a month or two later? Come November each year, how many among us revert? We're only human, after all. What a daunting task it is for each of us to remember and to undertake what we promised to do for a full year. There's no shame in the fact that most of us require guidance, mentoring, reminders and encouragement when the stakes are so high.

That is why I engage annually in a mid-year check up. Every March (or so), I look inward to gauge how I've been doing and how I am doing. Have I kept up my end of the promises I made six months ago? Have I transformed myself for the better? If not, why not? What, or who, is keeping me from achieving the resolutions I wanted to make? Perhaps I should revisit them, evaluating which are still attainable and which I might not realistically be able to accomplish.

The Jewish New Year falls right around the start of autumn every year. The leaves are changing colour and will soon fall off the trees. Nature is beginning to slow down and hibernate for the winter. Some of us venture outside more sparingly, and many of us engage in a type of hibernation of our own. Today, the season of spring is almost upon us. Life will soon begin to peek through the soil, confirming that warmer days are to come, and before we know it, the sun's summer rays will warm our faces.

I can't think of a better time to check in with ourselves, as our mid-year alarm clock begins to sound. On Rosh Hashanah, we hear the shofar as it wakens us to change. Six months later, we can evaluate these changes with the shofar blasts still resounding in our ears.

This is not the time to press the metaphorical snooze button, but instead to be fully present and alert. Check in with your emotions, your thoughts and behaviours, and your Judaism. Don't be afraid to challenge yourself, but at the same time, don't be afraid to award yourself the gift of forgiveness and encouragement. After evaluating the past six months of your life, permit yourself to accept the mistakes and missteps you have made. That is, after all, what this exercise is for.

Then, stand up tall, take a deep, cleansing breath, and move forward.

Remind yourself that you are capable of remarkable things – because, of course, you are.

Rabbi Ilyse Glickman is spiritual leader of Am Shalom Congregation in Barrie, Ont.

The lessons of Egypt

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Pesach is around the corner and thoughts of freedom, redemption and – yes – matzah, begin to fill our heads. Yet with all the grandeur of the events, sometimes the subtle moments get obscured. With the intention of increasing our seder discussions, here are some of the more subtle Pesach moments that appear in the midrash.

The Egyptians were slavemasters and very successful economic strategists. In the midrash, it discusses the Egyptian response to the plagues, and at certain times one can't help but be impressed with their attitude. When the plague of locusts hit, the midrash states that the Egyptians tried to find joy in their distress and instructed each other to go out with casks, gather the locusts into the casks and pickle them. This way they would have protein food stored and pickled in casks for whatever might still await them in the plagues ahead. It is for this reason, according to the midrash, that God removed the locusts so that "there remained not even one locust." When God handed them lemons, the Egyptians tried to make lemonade. They were thinking of tomorrow.

Yet Israel did not learn this trait from their Egyptian masters in all the years they spent in Egypt. Suffering blocks out views of tomorrow and thoughts of lemonade are unknown. Israel is crying out in pain and sees no opportunities lying in wait in Egypt. When God is telling Moses to instruct Israel in preparation of leaving Egypt, the text states that God says to Moses, "Speak, please, in the ears of the people and let each man ask of their neighbour and each woman of her neighbour for gold and silver articles." In English, it seems that God is addressing the word "please" to Moses, that he should please speak to Israel. The midrash understands that this would not make sense in that context, and, therefore, attaches the word "please" to Moses beseeching Israel to do this.

In other words, according to the midrash, Israel only wanted to leave. They were focused on the moment at hand and nothing more. In essence, Israel was saying "Dayainu" to God – just get us out! God is now telling Moses to implore Israel to ask for valuable articles before they leave. They must begin to think of tomorrow. Freedom has a practical side.

The beautifully subtle message is that what the Egyptians tried to do with the locusts is exactly what God is trying to teach Israel to do – plan for the future, come what may. The focus of the text is not on the lesson itself, but on the teacher of the lesson.

The Jewish lesson introduces what Pirkei Avot will later state so powerfully: "Make for yourself a rav," a teacher.

The world is filled with seemingly profound lessons, and we are often flooded with innovative thoughts. Yet we know that beyond the thought itself, we must always consider the source.

Israel has chosen not to learn from their cruel and inhuman masters. Israel has chosen God as the Master Teacher.

Israelite inscriptions

By ALEX GROPPER

In my last column I wrote about early Israelite inscriptions and their significance, but only got as far as the 11th century BCE. Yet most of the inscriptions that we have date from the 10th century BCE onward.

Past Forward

These inscriptions are important for obvious reasons, such as illuminating the writings of the Bible. They give us a context for the biblical text and show how widespread literacy was in a particular period.

Most recently, a new translation was made of an inscription excavated in 2008 in the Elah Valley in Israel, the place where David fought Goliath. What has made this translation doubly intriguing is both its dating and content.

The date of the inscription has been tentatively put in the 10th century BCE, roughly the time of David and Solomon, making it one of the earliest alphabetic inscriptions that we have from Israel. But its content is even more fascinating.

During a conference held at the University of Haifa on Jan. 7, Prof. Gershon Galil said that the translation he made of the inscription proved that there was a Davidic kingdom at that time, as well as showing that parts of the Bible were written as early as that period in the 10th century BCE. That's a highly controversial claim.

In his translation, Galil attempts to show that there was already a highly developed ethical and moral component in ancient Hebrew life, since his translation refers to the just treatment of slaves, widows and orphans.

Prior to the Elah Ostracon, the earliest Hebrew inscription was discovered in 1908 at the site of Gezer and is also dated to the 10th century BCE. Known as the Gezer Calendar, it deals with the agricultural cycle. It is written in an early alphabetic script, which indicates that there was literacy in ancient Israel. Although the Gezer Calendar shows no features that would label it as Hebrew, the inscription is generally classified together with early Hebrew inscriptions, but belonging to the northern Israelite or Phoenician variant.

More recently, in 1993, another fascinating inscription was found at the northern Israelite site of Tel Dan, by the legendary archeologist Avraham Biran. The inscription gave even more direct proof of the existence of David. It dates to the ninth century BCE and was probably inscribed to commemorate a victory by the Aramean king, Hazael of Damascus. The inscription appears to celebrate his defeat of the northern kingdom of Israel, as well as the southern kingdom of Judah and its Davidic dynasty.

What made this inscription so important was that it contains the first non-biblical mention of the "House of David." It has proven to be a strong argument against those who doubted the existence of David, especially since it would be difficult to have a Davidic dynasty without a David.

In 1975, an exciting discovery of an eighth century BCE ostracon, or inscribed pottery vessel, was found by archeologist, Ze'ev Meshel in the northern Sinai. The discovery ignited a great deal of controversy. What made this vessel so extraordinary was that it referred to "YHWH and his Asherah," implying that the God of Israel had a consort. It was a phenomenal discovery and seems to indicate that a pure Israelite monotheism was not yet fully developed.

It was a revelation that would be brought home to me a few years later when I was involved in the City of David Excavations in Jerusalem, which were directed by my friend, the late Yigal Shiloh.

Among the vast destruction debris of the First Temple, we found idols in the homes of people living in Jerusalem. It was a vivid reminder of why the prophets foretold the destruction of the city. It also showed me that human nature hadn't changed much in the last 2,500 years.

Food allergies and Passover

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Rivka Leah Schwartz faces year-round challenges in the kitchen. Her kids are sensitive to wheat, eggs and dairy. Her parents have to keep their cholesterol down, and don't eat eggs, and her relatives aren't allowed mushrooms and dried fruit that contains sulfites. If, like Rivka Schwartz, you have family members who must stay away from holiday staples such as nuts, eggs, most matzahs or even wine, you could use some advice. Fortunately, there's plenty on the web.

The Jewish Highway

Schwartz suggests investing in a kosher-for-Pesach steamer and steaming vegetables. Be careful not to fall back on chemical laden foods in your search for convenience. Look out for sulfites in grape juice, wine, raisins and dried fruit. What about Passover breakfasts? She suggests baked apples, baked pears, meringue cookies, cakes made with nuts, matzah and jelly, baked potato or sweet potato. [bit.ly/psch39]

Like Schwartz, when Leslie Anivum plans the family seder, she faces more challenges than most mothers. Her son, David, suffers from anaphylactic egg, nut, peanut and fish allergies. "My seder doesn't look all that different from anyone else's," she told the Hartford Courant. "I've just learned to adapt the ingredients." Anivum uses apricot butter or applesauce as a substitute for eggs in desserts and cookies, leaves nuts out of the charoset, uses regular rather than egg matzah and skips fish dishes altogether. [bit.ly/psch10]

For many years, wheat was virtually the only flour used in commercial matzah. Standard wheat matzah and other staples can be a minefield for people allergic to wheat. However, the Torah also allows matzahs to be made from barley, rye, oats and spelt.

And as Lisa Mandl points out, Passover time can actually be a "gluten-free gold mine" for people sensitive to wheat. Foods that are "non-gebrochts" are certified to be completely free of wheat, as well as spelt, barley, oats or rye. Now is the perfect time to stock up on specially formulated cakes, desserts, pancake mixes, even gluten-free kneidel mixes that can be enjoyed year-round. [bit.ly/psch12]

If you'd prefer to bake from scratch, here are some recipes for flourless Passover desserts. [bit.ly/psch13]

And then there is the "nut" problem. Michael Kesztenbaum says that "ground nuts are used in many Pesach cakes to replace the flour and work with the matzah meal to give the pudding flavour and texture." People with nut allergies use olive oil exclusively, because they are concerned that vegetable oils include nut oils. On the other hand, many manufacturers are becoming more sensitive and are beginning to offer more nut-free Passover products. [bit.ly/ psch40] Here are recipes for nut-free charoset, sponge cake, matzah balls and Passover pizza. [bit.ly/psch14]

Joe Regenstein adds this piece of advice for people scouring food labels for forbidden ingredients: "Consumers should not assume that kosher markings ensure the absence of trace amounts of the ingredient to which they are allergic." A professor of food science, he recommends "that the very allergic consumer consider purchasing cases of product and testing each product in small amounts first before allowing unrestricted access. A new lot of the product – a different "code" – should be treated as a new product." [bit.ly/psch15]

Although it is not an "allergy," one of the staples of the seder, wine, is off limits for recovering alcoholics. In order to remove the temptation, Rabbi Meir Kessler of Boca Raton, Fla., hosts one of many "sober seders" held in North America. [bit.ly/psch16] "The seder has a whole different meaning for a recovering addict who is trying to leave his own personal Egypt," says Rabbi Kessler. [bit.ly/psch17]

Next week, Passover for diabetics and people watching their waistline.

Islamic radicalism called temporary

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Though Islamic fundamentalism is riding high today, it may be a thing of the past in the future, an American political commentator and academic said last week.

Calling radical Islam a "temporary" phenomenon and only "one version of Islam," Daniel Pipes suggested it may well be supplanted by moderate Islam further down the road.

Daniel Pipes

"What appears eternal is transient," said Pipes, the founder and director of Middle East Forum, a conservative think tank, and Campus Watch, which monitors scholarship on the Middle East.

"Things will change," he added. "The wheel will turn."

Pipes' thesis was disputed by Wafa Sultan, a Muslim born and raised in Syria who immigrated to the United States in 1989 and is now a naturalized U.S. citizen residing in Los Angeles.

A psychiatrist and author, she claimed that moderate Islam is merely a "smokescreen" designed to conceal the radical nature of Islam.

Declaring that Islam is neither moderate nor peaceful, Sultan observed, "We can't reform Islam, but we can reform Muslims."

This process has begun and will take a few generations, but only Muslims can defeat radical Islam, said Sultan, who has criticized Muslim societies for treating non-Muslim minorities badly and not recognizing the accomplishments of its Jewish citizens.

Pipes and Sultan made their respective comments at an informal debate March 3 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation sponsored by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

Pipes, a scholar who holds a Harvard University PhD in Islamic history and has taught there as well, noted with alarm that some western countries are becoming "Shariah-law friendly" under the influence of radical Muslims.

He cited Britain as an example.

Positing "an alternative" to radical Islam, Pipes said there are "plenty" of moderate Muslims.

He cited Tahir ul-Qadri, a prominent Islamic scholar who recently issued a fatwa urging young Muslims to reject extremism and notions of "martyrdom."

Claiming that many Muslims oppose Shariah law, Pipes said they need the help of non-Muslims to resist Islamic encroachments.

"We have to encourage them and say, 'You are the true Muslims.'"

Radical Islam is the problem, while moderate Islam is the solution, he went on to say.

"To ignore moderates is to ignore the only real solution to the problem," said Pipes, who has contributed to the Wall Street Journal and the Jerusalem Post.

Quoting an Egyptian Muslim cleric, Pipes likened Islam to the multitude of products in a supermarket. "You can choose whichever [one] you desire."

Pipes described the present Muslim period, with its eruptions of radical Islam, as a bleak one. But he reminded his audience that the Muslim world was a haven for persecuted Jewish refugees prior to 1945. "Things may well reverse themselves. Who knows? Things change over time."

Sultan, who has called herself a Muslim who does not adhere to Islam, was not as hopeful as Pipes.

Having described Islam as a religion and political ideology, Sultan claimed that its objective, as stated in the Qur'an, is to rule the universe under Shariah law.

"That's the essence of Islam, a theologically driven ideology," said Sultan, the author of A God Who Hates: The Courageous Woman Who Inflamed the Muslim World Speaks Out Against the Evils of Radical Islam, published last year.

No less a person than the current prime minister of Turkey, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, is of the view that the phrase "moderate Islam" is offensive to Islam.

There is only one brand of Islam, she said, referring to Islamic radicalism.

Surveying the arc of Islamic history, Sultan noted that Muhammad, the prophet, was a "Jew hater," and that Jews and Christians could only live in Muslim lands on sufferance, provided they paid special taxes and recognized the primacy of Islam.

U of T honours dental fraternity

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

The Alpha Omega dental fraternity is a cradle to grave type of organization.

"We say Alpha Omega will be there for you. Alpha is the first letter of the Greek alphabet and Omega is the last," said Sheryl Lipton, the president of the fraternity's Toronto chapter. "We'll be there from the beginning of [our members' dental] careers to the end."

The fraternity, which will be honoured March 27 by the University of Toronto's faculty of dentistry, is an international organization of dentists. It offers support to new dentists and students entering the field, has programs for older professionals and is involved in charity work. This year, through their global oral health initiative, Alpha Omega is participating in building a dental clinic in Nicaragua and is continuing to support its Dental Volunteers for Israel program, which helps operate a dental clinic in Jerusalem.

"People feel we should be not only helping Jewish causes, but also [engaging in] tikkun olam, to repair the world," said Lipton, who became Toronto chapter last June. "This is part of what Alpha Omega does… We have a strong charitable and philanthropic component."

This is also part of the reason that Alpha Omega will be honoured by U of T.

The fraternity's Toronto chapter will be one of three recipients of the university's Award of Distinction, which celebrates individuals or groups that have made a difference in the field of dentistry. The two other recipients are also Alpha Omega members, and so is David Mock, the dean of the faculty of dentistry at U of T.

While Mock wasn't involved in the decision to honour Alpha Omega, he has been a member since 1964.

Sheryl Lipton

"[Alpha Omega] creates an ethic of what health-care practitioners should be doing. They introduce, even though it's not limited to Jewish students, a Judaic ethic… of caring, of tikkun olam," he said. "[The group] provides mentorship with seasoned practitioners. They also provide some ongoing… mentoring."

Mock commended the organization for its charitable work in Toronto, which includes contributions to dental clinics such as the one at Mount Sinai Hospital, as well as two financial awards given to U of T students, one through the university and one through Alpha Omega.

For Lipton, providing support to dental students is a crucial part of her work at Alpha Omega. As Toronto chapter president, she helped create a new mentorship program that pairs new dentists or students with dental professionals.

"We're trying to meet the needs of our young graduates," she said.

Lipton was also involved in creating a program that supports dentists age 50 and older.

"We're trying to meet everyone's needs as best we can," she said.

Lipton has been practising dentistry for 28 years. She was offered the presidency 12 years ago, but declined because her three daughters were too young.

"Alpha Omega means so much to me. It was important to accept the role as president," she said, adding that she's been involved with the group since she graduated from U of T in 1982.

The 2010 Awards of Distinction gala will be held March 27 at the Toronto Marriott Downtown Eaton Centre Hotel. Cocktails are at 6 p.m. and dinner is at 7 p.m. Tickets, which include dinner, are $250. For tickets, call 416-979-4940, ext. 1, or visit www.utoronto.ca/denstistry/gala.

Schwartz to compete in three Paralympic events

"I figured I'll just try it for one year," she says. "Then I showed up at the Ontario championships and won two golds. I was absolutely shocked."

The terms used for competitions can vary: disabled, adaptive, para-alpine. But what is certain is that the races are as fast and challenging as those in non-disabled skiing, though, as in the Paralympic Games, scores are sometimes equalized to create a level playing field between skiers with different disabilities.

Several key wins led Schwartz to the World Cup of para-alpine skiing in Italy this January, and there, she qualified to represent Canada at the 2010 Paralympic Games. Even before qualifying in December, she was also chosen to carry the Olympic torch at Blue Mountain resort, near Collingwood.

Between March 13 and 20, she plans to compete in three out of five Paralympic events: slalom, giant slalom and super-G – a cross between slalom and downhill that gives athletes only a single chance to complete a faster run than other slalom events, with up to 30 tricky direction changes. Paralympic skiers compete on the same courses as Olympic women's teams.

"It's thrilling to watch," says Schwartz's father, Jay, who, along with other family members and friends, will be cheering on his daughter in person in British Columbia. He'd be "thrilled to death" to see his daughter place in the top 10 this year, but, "as long as she doesn't hurt herself, I'm happy."

Realistically, Schwartz is excited just to be competing this year. Her goal isn't the podium – yet. "I'm not in the top 10… I know that there are a lot of people better than me."

But her coach believes she has a shot at a medal in the next games, and that's what Schwartz has set her sights on. "Everything I can do this year is working toward 2014."

Melanie Schwartz

When she's not skiing, Schwartz enjoys giving back to organizations that helped her get her start, like the War Amps CHAMP program for child amputees. She's also taught skiing to disabled kids: she started working as an instructor with Ontario Track 3 as soon as she turned 17. She's sorry that she hasn't been able to teach in the past few years because she's competing most of the winter.

Though competition has meant putting her computer career largely on hold to train and compete all winter, she's found some balance by continuing the basic pattern that began with a co-op program in university. It alternated four months of study with four months of work. Now, her schedule is more like "ski in the winter, work in the summer."

"I am my own biggest motivation," Schwartz says. "What drives me most now is challenging myself to become better. I can look back and see that I've improved a lot, or look forward and see how much more there is to learn… and when you do get it, the feeling is fantastic."

You can watch ongoing coverage of para-alpine and other 2010 Paralympic events, including video interviews with Schwartz and other athletes, at http://www.ctvolympics.ca/paralympics, http://www.youtube.com/paralympicsporttv or http://www.paralympicsport.tv.

Rabbis see little action at Vancouver Olympics

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The multifaith centres inside the athletes' villages in Whistler and Vancouver were heavily underused during the Olympics, according to Rabbi Shmuel Birnham, rabbi of Congregation Har El on the North Shore of Vancouver.

Rabbi Birnham was asked to be the Jewish clergyman on the Winter Olympics' multifaith committee, which included Christian, Hindu, Muslim and Buddhist clergy.

"Apparently a number of groups brought their own ministers or priests along," he said. "That makes sense, because for those who are religious, the athletes don't want any kind of change in their routine. Looking for an inner connection with a new pastor is not the easiest thing."

Rabbi Birnham had asked eight rabbis in the Vancouver area to cover different times during the Games, and he said that although the rabbis interacted with Israeli athletes at the various public forums, there wasn't much need for their services.

"That's fine," he said. "You prepare for a disaster, and when you don't have to use the disaster packet, you're happy."

Games organizers had informed the multifaith committee that approximately one per cent of the participants in the Winter Olympics would seek assistance from the multifaith clergy, which, for the rabbis, translated to roughly 30 Jewish people in each village.

Although their services weren't needed, Rabbi Birnham said having access to the athletes' villages was a wonderful experience.

"It was great to wander around and feel the atmosphere," he says.

"In the interfaith community of Vancouver, new relationships were created and old relationships were rekindled and deepened. I know that things will be happening in the interfaith world in Vancouver as a result of this."

Haitian quake victim's body finally found

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After seven agonizing weeks for the family, the remains of Alexandre Bitton, the only Jewish Canadian killed in the Jan. 12 earthquake in Haiti, were finally recovered March 2 in the rubble of the Hotel Montana, his mother confirmed last Friday.

When found, he was the only Canadian still missing at the completely levelled Port-au-Prince hotel.

"They know it's him because they found him in his room with all his papers on him," Jocelyne Bitton told The CJN last Friday. "He had his passport on him, his wallet on him with all his credit cards, so from what the RCMP is telling us, they are sure it is him."

Alexandre Bitton

Still, while some closure came in knowing Bitton had been found, the family – still upset over what they said was a lack of co-operation by Foreign Affairs officials in keeping them informed about Bitton's whereabouts – remained frustrated by delays in getting a necessary dental-record match done to absolutely confirm his identity.

"The coroner's team was there on Thursday," Jocelyne Bitton said last week, "but they changed people and they won't be back at work until Sunday. The test won't take place until Monday [March 8], and we hope to have [the confirmation] by the middle of the week.

"I don't understand why the team couldn't wait one more day," she continued. "The waiting was hard for seven weeks, but this week it is unbearable, knowing he is found but cannot be put to rest."

She said the family's sense of relief in finally knowing her son's fate was tempered by the awareness that all hope is now gone.

"This is the news we were waiting for, but didn't want to hear," she said. "We were getting desperate that he wouldn't be found at all. Even in our head if we knew he was probably dead, there was a glimmer of hope. Now there's none."

She said it's not yet known whether any family member or other member of the community would travel to Haiti to facilitate the return of her son's body to Montreal.

Ironically, Jocelyne's husband, Ralph Bitton, once supervised a sports-study program at Antoine-de-St-Exupery High School in Montreal's east end that had included the participation of Olympic figure skating bronze medallist Joannie Rochette, whose mother, Therese, died suddenly in Vancouver just before her daughter was to compete. Jocelyne said her husband and Rochette stayed in touch on Facebook, but she didn't know whether Rochette was aware of what had happened to her former teacher's son.

Montreal man leaves wife, two-year-old son

"Ralph didn't want to add to her pain by informing her," Jocelyne said.

According to Shaare Zedek Congregation's Rabbi Alan Bright, a friend of the family who has been in regular contact, there is a general consensus among religious authorities that mourning can begin once a body is recovered and identified.

Bright married Bitton and his wife, Line Dufresne, at his shul in August 2009, and they have a two-year-old son, Joshua.

Bitton, 36, was an Internet technology consultant and was on his first trip to Haiti on business with a colleague, who was just outside the hotel when it collapsed. The colleague survived.

U.S. appears naive as Syria courts Iran

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In "Fanning the winds of war" (Winnipeg Free Press, March 2), Samuel Segev wrote about how, following the appointment of Robert Ford as the first U.S. ambassador to Syria in five years, the Obama administration was counting on Damascus to distance itself from Tehran and to stop arms transfers to Hezbollah. However, neither is remotely likely to happen. As a result, the United States appears to be naive about the influence it can yield.

Syrian President Bashar Assad "has no incentive to weaken his ties to Tehran," Segev noted. "On the contrary, he believe[s] his continued ties to Tehran would only increase his value and would increase the American incentives." (Ford will assume his posting following U.S. Senate confirmation, which seems assured. Yet, apart from his presence lending prestige to Assad's regime, it's not clear what the United States gains.)

Assad underscored this determination to stand by Iran by hosting a summit late last month with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Hezbollah chief Hassan Nasrallah – a meeting that featured prominent denunciations of both U.S. Mideast policy and, of course, Israel. Moreover, in response to U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's calls on Damascus to free itself from Iran's grip, Assad increased not only the quantity of Iranian arms transfers to Hezbollah but also their quality, including advanced surface-to-surface missiles.

Segev quoted Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak, who spoke in Washington on Feb. 26: "Lebanon is a member of the UN and is also now a member of the UN Security Council. But Lebanon has also a 'private' army [Hezbollah], not subordinated to the state, and this militia has an arsenal of 45,000 missiles and rockets that can hit targets anywhere in Israel. We cannot accept this."

Israeli analysts have expressed surprise that the United States has been under some sort of illusion that Syria could be pried away from its alliance with Iran. They point out that during previous negotiations with Israel, Syria never indicated its willingness to break this bond. So why not take Syria at its word?

Assad is not the only one to assert his ties with Iran. Damascus-based Hamas head Khaled Meshal has been moving closer to Iran. Following the Damascus summit, he was Ahmadinejad's guest of honour in Tehran at a conference on "Islamic and National Solidarity with the Palestinian People," during which calls for Israel's destruction figured prominently. Hamas policy has consequently become even more extreme (Meshal, for instance, has renounced previous talk of a long-term truce along the 1967 borders with Israel).

Into this toxic assembly of Assad, Meshal and Nasrallah – with Ahmadinejad and gang close at hand – Ford plans to inject his presence. And this comes at a time that the international community, including foremost the UN, has all but given up on pursuing Assad as the prime suspect in the 2005 assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri, the event that prompted the United States to pull its ambassador from Damascus.

Providing an ostensibly different perspective, in "Report: Syria willing to consider gradual approach to peace" (Ha'aretz, March 2), Akiva Eldar related how Gabrielle Rifkind, a "conflict resolution specialist" with the Oxford Research Group, told him that according to Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Muallem, whom she met in Damascus last December, Syria is serious about peace with Israel. This would involve stages of Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights in exchange for a "form of normalization" according to Rifkind. This of course sounds very encouraging to western ears.

Yet on the crucial issue of Syria's ties with Iran and Hezbollah, Eldar wrote: "[Muallem] said that [Syria] will not negotiate any change in its relationship with Hezbollah and Hamas until after the Golan is returned. 'Key questions, such as Syria's support for Hamas, Hezbollah and its policy to Iran, would only be answered after withdrawal,' [Muallem] said."

Only after Israeli withdrawal?

In short, enough said.

Not to be missed – from the Economist's Feb. 27 "Lexington" column about U.S. President Barack Obama's policy of relying on drone attacks in Pakistan:

"For some reason, his habit of blowing up alleged terrorists and bystanders from the air causes less global outrage than the smothering of a lone Hamas operative, allegedly by Israel, in a hotel room in Dubai."

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Throne speech backs Holocaust memorial

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The federal government will support legislation to create a national Holocaust memorial in Ottawa.

In the speech from the throne last week, the government announced: "It supports the establishment of a national monument to the victims of communism and it will support legislation to establish a national Holocaust memorial."

The memorial will be created under terms of a private member's bill that has already passed first reading and is heading for committee, said Thornhill MP Peter Kent, junior minister for foreign affairs.

"We have a variety of Holocaust memorials on a smaller scale," Kent said. "A national memorial somewhere in the National Capital Region will be appropriate."

The bill, now called An Act to Establish a National Holocaust Monument, was first proposed by former Thornhill MP Susan Kadis after it was suggested by Thornhill resident Laura Grossman. It is now being sponsored by Edmonton-area MP Tim Uppal, Kent said.

"It's a wonderful gesture by the prime minister to include it in the speech from the throne," he said.

Kent expects the bill to pass quickly, as it has all-party support. Once enacted, the National Capital Commission will designate a location and call for designs. "No federal money will go to it. It would be funded privately. That's a minor challenge," he said.

In another announcement, the throne speech said the government would take steps to streamline the process under which war criminals are brought to justice.

"Our government will also introduce legislation to speed up the revocation of citizenship of those who have concealed their war crimes," the throne speech stated.

The legislation "will provide for an expedited consideration and decision process which will remove some of the legal foot-dragging and delay tactics," Kent said, including the process in cabinet, where the revocation occurs.

The speech from the throne, in a section on immigration, said that "our government will introduce legislation to establish Pier 21 in Halifax – the site where so many began their Canadian journey – as Canada's national museum of immigration."

Government to streamline process to bring war criminals to justice

Jewish organizations are currently working on a memorial that will appear at the site documenting the policy that turned away Jewish refugees on board the St. Louis, sending them back to Europe where many were killed.

Canadian Jewish Congress lauded the throne speech's announcements on immigrants.

"Today's throne speech had a proper mixture of both justice and memory in dealing with past crimes, the need for justice to be done and the importance of remembrance," said Congress CEO Bernie Farber.

"We are heartened by the government's decision to introduce legislation that will speed up the revocation of citizenship of those who concealed their war crimes in order to gain Canadian citizenship. In particular, we hope that this legislation will finally bring to justice Nazi enabler Helmut Oberlander, a translator for a mobile killing unit during World War II that murdered tens of thousands of people, the majority of which were Jews. The Canadian Jewish community awaits the decision by cabinet in regard to Mr. Oberlander's denaturalization and deportation. It is important that the words of the throne speech now be put into action," Farber said.

Peter Kent

"We are very encouraged by the government's decision to establish a national Holocaust memorial. Congress has long advocated for such a memorial to help future generations recognize humanity's capacity for evil. With such understanding comes hope for the future," he added.

AMOS system helps 'defuse the confusion'

"Once the threat is identified, the system tells the pilot on the monitor what is the immediate action he has to take, and the scenarios are presented to him based on models of terrorists who went on board and carried with them residuals of explosives, biological or chemical agents."

Not only does the AMOS system provide information about an imminent threat, "it defuses the confusion. AMOS tells the pilot on the monitor you must do A, B and C," Raif said.

The responses, he continued, are based on Israeli experiences with counterterrorism.

Though AMOS was designed with flights in mind, it can be adapted to other "means of mass transportation, including trains, cruise ships and [subways]."

Raif, who served in the Israeli consulate in Toronto from 1976 to 1981, said the AMOS system was developed to allow airlines to comply with a 2007 directive from the U.S. Federal Aviation Authority that required air crews be discreetly informed in flight of potentially dangerous situations.

"We are the only company dealing with aircraft cabin security," he said. "We are not competing with airport security. We complement it."

The system would have detected the underwear bomber, who passed successfully through airport security but assembled his dangerous concoction of explosive chemicals on board.

Although it has been under development for a few years and a prototype is expected by the end of 2010, AMOS is still seeking new investors for a cash infusion to further develop the product, Raif said.

The company was created by a number of Israelis with experience in the country's security establishment. CEO Shmuel Sasson is the former director of the security division of El Al Israel Airlines. He also retired recently from the Israel Security Agency, also known as Shin Bet, where he held the equivalent rank of brigadier general.

Lotan Lior is former commander of the Israel Defence Forces' hostage unit and counterterrorism unit, and Gil Shavit is an engineer with expertise in advanced digital video applications.

Israeli Consul General Amir Gissin said AMOS further demonstrates "the fact that Israel is a world leader in the area of civil aviation security. That's something coming to the awareness of many countries and it adds positively to the way people look at what Israel has to offer. It's a real technical achievement."

Raif said he expects the cost of the onboard system to run between $330,000 and $500,000 (US) per aircraft, "not much for a plane worth $150 million to $200 million" and much less than the $3.5-million cost of a single entertainment system.

"No airline will refuse," he predicted.

CHAT team wins mock trial event

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Grade 12 mock trial team from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy's Kimel Centre placed first in the York Region Judge's Cup Competition.

The annual tournament is open to all high schools in York Region and held in the real courtrooms of the Newmarket Court. Judges of the Ontario and Superior Courts of Justice preside over the moots and judge the event.

This year, 22 schools took part, and TanenbaumCHAT was judged to be the best for 2010. In addition to the team victory, two students also won individual prizes. Yoni Taylor won the Ontario Justice Education Network's award for advocacy and Jordyn Benatar won the most prestigious award of the event – most valuable player.

Mock trial competitions give students the opportunity to participate in a simulated criminal trial using a case created by the Ontario Bar Association. They play the roles of lawyers and witnesses, and engage in the actual processes conducted in a criminal trial, including direct and cross examinations, and opening and closing statements.

Teams must prepare to play both Crown and defence, as the decision of what side they'll take is made as the result of a coin toss a few minutes prior to each moot.

This year's mock trial team was composed of students Jordyn Benatar (witness), Oron Eli (lawyer), Josh Fluxgold (strategist), Josh Freedman (strategist), Eric Frydrych (strategist), Jeremy Halpern (lawyer), Sarah Navy (strategist), Adam Rivietz (witness), Maury Rubin (strategist), Miera Srebrolow (lawyer), Jody Steinman (strategist) and Yoni Taylor (lawyer). Lynne Howard is the coach.

The students began preparing for the competition in October, and they're preparing for their second competition this spring.

UWO students receive threatening messages

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Several students at the University of Western Ontario received threatening messages last week after starting a Facebook group against Israeli Apartheid Week.

The students, who started or participated in a group called UWO Students Against Israeli Apartheid Week, were sent anonymous messages from a "fake" Facebook account, which means the subscriber used a false identity and a picture of someone other than himself/herself on the page. One of the messages stated that the student should, "Watch your actions next week, young lady. You don't want to be hurt."

Dana Gold, a member of Israel on Campus at UWO, along with two other students, reported the messages to the university campus police last Sunday.

"I went to a party that night. I got home, I was about to go to sleep, at 3 a.m. I got [the message]. I didn't know who it was from, it was telling me to watch my back, I was scared," said Gold, adding that the Facebook group was set up to help Jewish students deal with IAW on campus.

The group, which has more than 400 members and is separate from Israel on Campus, had information about anti-IAW initiatives and suggestions about how to deal with any IAW concerns.

"It wasn't anything hateful. It was just showing students how to deal with [IAW]," Gold said.

"I feel intimidated walking on campus, not only because I'm a Jew but because [the person who wrote the message] knows what we look like."

Campus police don't believe that the messages were sent by a UWO student, but they are investigating the incident, said Helen Connell, the university's associate vice-president of communications and public affairs.

"I can totally appreciate how disturbing [the messages] were… Our campus police are taking this very seriously, and there is an investigation underway," she said, adding that campus police work in co-operation with the London city police and make a point of speaking to student groups before events such as IAW.

"I'm sure it's a challenging time for some people, because what we have here is a week when people are expressing viewpoints that are offensive to some people and difficult for them to hear," Connell said. "Universities are places where we promote free speech. That does not override the right of every person who studies… on this campus to feel safe."

During IAW, Israel on Campus organized a lecture by Khaled Abu Toameh, an Israeli Arab journalist, and ran information sessions. Jewish students, separate from Israel on Campus, also organized a pro-Israel rally at the university.

Students at York University started a new campaign last week to counter IAW. Hasbara at York, along with Christians United for Israel and StandWithUs, a pro-Israel campus group, launched their Israel Under Fire campaign, which aimed to raise awareness about Israel and the Israel Defence Forces through information tables and daily prayers for the safety of Israeli soldiers.

The campaign, which ran from March 1 to 4, was well received, said Naomi Samuel, Hasbara's vice-president of public relations.

"The first day of our campaign we witnessed incredible unity among Jewish and pro-Israel students on campus," she said, adding that this initiative is a different approach for Hasbara.

"Hasbara at York is doing everything it can to counter the anti-Semitism and anti-Israel propaganda that will be flooding York University throughout the week," she said. "We decided to take a different approach to promoting and defending Israel through standing in solidarity with the Israel Defence Forces… our goal is to empower the Jewish and pro-Israel community at York."

According to Keith Marnoch, York's associate director of media relations, there were no major incidents during IAW last week.

"All the events that various groups had intended to run have gone without a hitch. There hasn't really been anything out of the ordinary," he said, adding that York security was visible in Vari Hall last week, where most of the information tables were set up.

"We have had a few more security [guards] visible in the Vari Hall area, not so much to intimidate but more to manage… the people who have set up tables and so on," he said.

Winnipeg JSA/Hillel counter IAW

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's first Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) will take place at University of Manitoba at the same time that JSA/Hillel will be running Israel Awareness Week activities that were scheduled and planned months ago.

The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg only learned at the end of February that U of M would be taking part in IAW March 8 to 12.

"It is possible that the organizers of IAW timed their events to take place during the same week we have scheduled our events," Bob Freedman, the CEO of the Jewish federation, said in a phone interview, adding that he didn't know for sure.

"Samantha Loxton, [director of JSA/Hillel] has been in contact with the Muslim Students Association, and they have assured us that, unlike what has been the case in other cities, they are not backing this event. Their name is not listed as a sponsor on the IAW website," Freedman said.

Bob Freedman

The main sponsors for IAW in Winnipeg are the local chapters of Canada-Palestine Support Network (CanPalNet), Independent Jewish Voices (IJV) and ActLeft, a student group at the University of Manitoba.

JSA/Hillel is putting on two pro-Israel events on the U of M campus during the week in question. These include a talk by Israeli-Arab law professor Mohammed Wattad on March 8, and a day where students will be setting up a shuk, or open market, March 11, with free giveaways, falafel, information and video clips that showcase the beauty and culture of Israel and the country's business, medical and technological achievements.

When asked about security for Wattad's lecture, Freedman said, "We are relying on university campus security and have raised the issue of security with U of M."

Freedman also raised the issue of ensuring that IAW activities do not lead to harassment of pro-Israel students. In a letter dated Feb. 26, he wrote to U of M president David Barnard: "We trust that the university will ensure a safe environment for all students so that freedom of expression can occur, without repression, without intimidation or worry for both sides of the equation."

John Danakas, the director of public affairs at U of M, told The CJN in an e-mail that U of M will "respond promptly to behaviours that constitute discrimination, harassment or represent a violation to Canada's laws.

"We will continue to monitor [IAW] closely, and please be assured that maintaining a safe and respectful environment for our students, faculty and staff remains a priority for the University of Manitoba."

In addition to events at U of M, JSA/Hillel also planned two activities off-campus – a hooka night March 9 at an eatery where students can get a taste of Israel, and The Israeli-Palestinian Comedy Tour show that took place at the West End Cultural Centre the week before IAW.

As for responding to IAW, Freedman said JSA/Hillel will have students at every IAW event to "monitor the events, but not to disrupt.

"Our student leadership is disciplined, and they know how to conduct themselves… If a student asks us about attending an IAW event, we will tell them to go if they are interested, and if there is something they feel ought to be questioned, then they ought to do so in an appropriate fashion. We don't want any Jewish students or any people from the Jewish community who aren't students disrupting or starting any kind of outburst or riot."

The federation also plans to have staff at the university on different days, Freedman said, and he himself will be going to U of M during IAW.

"We will be there in a supportive role," he said, adding he estimates that about a dozen pro-Israel professors will make themselves visible that week.

"Their job won't be to counter IAW, but to be supportive of our students," he said.

York taking 'disciplinary measures' against student

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

York University is investigating a student who allegedly called for the mass murder of Jews, but at the same time, the student appears to be avoiding investigators.

Following reports in the National Post that Salman Hossain posted material on his website, "Filthy Jewish Terrorists," calling for the genocide of Jews, York attempted to confirm Hossain's authorship.

But calls and e-mails were unanswered, leading the university to dispatch someone from its security department to one of his classes for "a face-to-face meeting," said Keith Marnoch, York's associate director of media relations.

The university is concerned that Hossain may have breached the school's Student Code of Conduct, and a tribunal hearing is pending, Marnoch said.

"The individual Salman Hossain, upon being confronted by us, did not respond to us and we've taken the appropriate disciplinary measures," he said following security's attempt to meet with Hossain.

Marnoch would not give details of the effort to confront Hossain at his class. He also declined to specify the "disciplinary measures" or whether Hossain has been barred from campus.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, said keeping Hossain away from the university is the least York could do.

"In our view, the safety and security of York University's student body superceded anything else. They're [York administrators] going to have to find a way to deal appropriately with Mr. Hossain," he said.

In a report published last week, the National Post quoted from Hossain's website and noted he did not dispute that they were his views.

"No one in this world can take our history away from us. Especially not the cancerous group of people calling themselves Jews or Judeo-Christians who are going to be genocided in the near future," he is quoted as writing.

The website also pictures a graphic stating, "Terrorism is A Jewish Passover Celebration," and in a purported rebuttal of the National Post article, Hossain admits to advocating the genocide of Jews.

"Just like you are co-opting western nations to attack Muslim states and slaughter the populations over there. Most Jews in North America and Europe support the war against Islam and Muslims, which they instigated. They are happy to see Muslims get slaughtered. They enjoy the deaths of millions of Muslims, and the slaughter that they are undergoing. Thus they should also be at the receiving end of what they are perpetrating against others."

Hossain's alleged writings prompted a police investigation to determine whether he breached the Criminal Code's hate promotion and advocacy of genocide provisions.

Farber said Congress had "been getting quite a number of calls from students and parents" concerned about safety on campus.

"There is an absolute necessity for the administration of York University to protect and defend the student body. We can't get any information to confirm that is happening," he said.

Farber noted that police investigated Hossain, but last year, Ontario Attorney General Chris Bentley decided not to prosecute. (The attorney general's consent is required for a case to proceed.)

Bentley said at the time that Hossain had removed his offensive postings and was undergoing rehabilitation.

Marnoch said the university is concerned about following due process, but if investigators confirm Hossain authored the Web postings, a disciplinary tribunal could be convened.

SIZE DOESN'T MATTER

Hillel members Josh Spatz, left, and David Cohen did brisk business selling $1 falafel during I-Fest, a celebration of Israel's culture, held at McGill University's Shatner student building. On the theme "Size Doesn't Matter" – the title of the new Canadian Federation of Jewish Students campaign – the information day presented Israel as a small, but modern and sexy, country that is a good place to visit, study or live.

IAW is anti-Israel, not pro-Palestinian: journalist

By MICHAEL ISENBERG
Special to The CJN

Students using violence or abusive speech in support of Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) are not pro-Palestinian, they're anti-Israel, says Israeli Arab journalist Khaled Abu Toameh.

"If you are pro-Palestinian, go to Palestine and teach illiterate kids how to read and write. Help abused women, impoverished people. That's pro-Palestinian. Help the Palestinians better their lives," Toameh said at a Hillel-sponsored talk at Ryerson University last week.

Toameh, the West Bank and Gaza correspondent for the Jerusalem Post and U.S. News and World Report, discussed several issues regarding Israel's relationship with the surrounding Arab countries, including problems with Iran, extremist governments and a lack of free speech that results in misleading, anti-Israel media coverage around the world.

A large part of his talk, however, focused on the promotion of boycotts, divestment and sanctions against Israel, most notably by young adults on university campuses, as exemplified by IAW.

"There's no concept of boycotting Israel by Palestinians. The first time I heard of Israeli boycotts was three years ago in North America," he said, referring to IAW.

Toameh's concern is not that people should be denied their freedom to disagree with Israeli politics, but that he finds these boycotts are ineffective and damaging.

"If you want to boycott, why do something negative? Go do something positive. Go help people."

He argued that many boycotters are not well informed on the issues in the Middle East and are not very supportive of Palestinians, but rather against Israel.

"The majority of people I've met in the U.S. leading Israeli Apartheid Weeks are not even Palestinian. They're Lebanese. I tell them [create a campaign for] apartheid of Lebanon, because [the Lebanese] have a ban on certain people from working in 62 professions. These students, they say, 'Shut up.' Clearly, they don't really care about the people."

He added that many people who argue against Israel's actions haven't thought out the repercussions of their proposed resolutions, such as that regarding land ownership.

"Even if [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu accepts a two-state solution, who do you give the land to? Hamas? Fatah?

"People ask me, 'When did you become pro-Israel, a Zionist Arab?'

"I say, 'As a journalist I am pro-facts, pro-truth.'"

Toameh classifies himself as pro-Palestinian because he speaks out against corrupt Arab governments through his work in the Israeli media, hoping to bring about change. He noted that most moderate Muslims' voices are silenced by their governments.

Regarding the West Bank, Toameh said he hates the label "apartheid wall," adding that the wall is unwanted by most Israelis, but its benefits are too great to ignore.

"This wall was built because of [the late Palestinian leader Yasser] Arafat. His name should go on the wall," he said.

"Thanks to the wall, I can take my kids freely around Israel… and not worry about bombings and the picking up of corpses. It's called reality. Because on the other side of the wall, it's frightening."

Toameh concluded his talk with the message that all the issues people have with Israel stem from its very existence.

"The majority of the world has not come to terms with Israel's right to exist. There is no other conflict. People have to wake up."

OUT OF THE COLD: In the middle of Israel Apartheid Week, Muslim and Jewish university students came together at the University of Western Ontario to build a more positive relationship between their communities and to make sandwiches for London's underprivileged. Seventy-five students came out to the event hosted by the Tzedaka/Sadaqah Project which resulted in over 250 sandwiches being distributed to the needy.

Students connect to Israel through art

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

The menorah in Liat Shalom's artwork isn't just a religious symbol. It's a link to her heritage.

"That specific menorah has been in my family for four or five generations. It was given to my mom by my great-grandfather," she said, adding that he immigrated from Poland to New Brunswick, where he helped start a Jewish community.

"He built a shul with his own two hands," she said.

Shalom, a first-year new-media-arts student at Ryerson University, uses her art, which includes sketches and digitally manipulated photos, to express the connection with Judaism that her grandfather worked so hard to forge.

This is why it's appropriate that she submitted her work to Artzy, a Hillel-sponsored arts and music night that takes place on March 18 at Andrew Richard Design Studio in Toronto.

In its third year, Artzy aims to celebrate Israel and Judaism through music, photography and visual art. The event, which is supported by the Birthright alumni committee, features more than 50 works of art from students and community members in Ontario, as well as a performance by Israeli singer David Broza.

While attending last year's event, Shalom, who was born in Israel and moved to Canada three years ago, felt homesick.

"It had a lot of very strong symbolism, it evoked a lot of very strong emotions in me," Shalom said. "It's a good way to see Israel through various people's eyes."

Rotem Stark, Hillel's director of arts and culture in Toronto, agrees.

Stark has been organizing this year's event with Hillel since September.

"It's such a special night. This is really a night for everyone in the community to come together, regardless of age and background," she said, adding that Artzy is a change from most pro-Israeli events.

"We do so much in the community in Hillel. We have so many initiatives that have to do with politics. Through art, I feel people can really connect in different ways," she said. "Art can be so many things to so many people. It's such a beautiful way to bring people together."

Liat Shalom submitted this digitally manipulated photograph of herself to Artzy, a Hillel-sponsored arts and music night. Ryerson University student Tal-Or Freedman took the original photo.

So far, about 25 artists have submitted work, which includes everything from mezuzot and sculptures to animations, musical performances and paintings.

The fact that Artzy falls right after Israeli Apartheid Week isn't a coincidence, Stark said.

"It's a good time to have it because IAW is such a hit on the Jewish community and our students. We wanted to have a great event, an uplifting event just to show the beautiful side of Israel," she said.

For Maxine Seider, a fourth-year arts and science student at the University of Guelph, the event is a good way to connect with the Jewish community.

"I think it's a way that people can connect in a non-political environment," she said, adding that she's also submitted work to Artzy.

"It's a great way to get people hooked on Israel... we need that. A lot of people see Israel as this political place where there's a lot of conflict. I think it's important to show the fun side."

IT'S NOT JUST AN AIRLINE. IT'S ISRAEL

About Righteous Among the Nations

An individual is considered for the title "Righteous Among the Nations" when the data, based on Survivor testimony or other documentation, clearly demonstrates that, during the Second World War, a non-Jewish person risked his or her life, freedom, and safety, in order to rescue one or several Jews from the threat of death or deportation without exacting monetary compensation or other rewards.

Remembering the Past, Shaping the Future

The State of Israel has designated Yad Vashem as the sole entity that can bestow the title "Righteous Among the Nations."

About Yad Vashem

Yad Vashem, The Holocaust Remembrance and Education Centre in Jerusalem, is the universal guardian and imparter of the Shoah's (Holocaust's) legacy and the protector of human values. Visited by over 1 million people annually, Yad Vashem is internationally recognized as being at the forefront of Holocaust commemoration, education, documentation, and research.

About The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem is one of Yad Vashem's largest and most prominent of its 28 representative bodies worldwide. The Society supports Yad Vashem's initiatives and implements its important vision across Canada. Through its educational and commemorative activities, the Society carries out Yad Vashem's mission of ensuring that the Holocaust and its lessons are forever engraved in the memory of humankind.

Obituary

Baycrest was Ross' 'No. 1 organization'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Sam Ross, a real estate developer who had a longtime commitment to Baycrest, died Feb. 22 at age 84.

A former member of Baycrest's board of directors, Ross served as chair of the building committee for the Terraces of Baycrest and the Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Centre.

After receiving Baycrest men's service group Man of the Year Award in 1976, Ross assumed key executive volunteer positions, including chairman and vice-president of the board.

In 2003 he was appointed an honorary director of Baycrest, and in 2005, a leadership gift from Ross and his wife, Ida, enabled Baycrest to establish the Sam and Ida Ross Memory Clinic as part of its focus on brain health.

An avid long distance runner, he always participated in Baycrest's Fun Run fundraiser.

Sam Ross

Mark Gryfe, president of Baycrest Foundation, said that Baycrest was Ross' "number 1 organization. When he took on the project of building the Terraces, he lived it. He went into the place and supervised the construction site. He took his professional experience and brought it to Baycrest. It is his lasting legacy."

Donald Rafelman, who served as vice-chair of the Terraces advisory committee, said that Ross "couldn't have put more effort into the project if it had been his own private venture. His extreme dedication and unrelenting commitment were evident right from the start."

Gryfe said that he has heard from "countless people" who called Ross a quiet gentleman whom people respected. "He was very low key and not into anything for his ego. If all we have to leave behind is our reputation, then Sam's memory will be a good one."

In his eulogy, Ross' son, Jeffery, said that it was a common family joke how quiet his father was. After joining his father at a business meeting, however, "a debate ensued. When [my father raised his hand to speak] the room fell silent, with someone noting that 'Sam had something to say.'

"What transpired was not so much the fact that Dad could see beyond the immediate issues with a great insight, but moreover, to me, the respect and recognition that was given to Dad by his peers."

Born in Poland near the Russian border, Ross came to Canada with his family when he was four years old. "As a young man, he worked with his father as a carpenter, and during World War II, he joined the air force and served as a mechanic," his son said.

At this time, he met his wife, Ida, to whom he was married for 55 years before her death in 2006. "At a speech my father once gave, he said that of all the deals he had ever made, the best deal was marrying Ida."

Jeffery Ross said that on Yom Kippur of 2008, he heard a rabbi's sermon, which left a powerful impression. "I will always remember the last two words… 'Be good.' Sam Ross was a good man."

Sam Ross was husband of the late Ida and father of the late Murray. He leaves behind his son Bernie and daughter-in-law Ruth; son Jeffrey and daughter-in-law Diane; and daughter-in-law Rhonda. He also leaves eight grandchildren and two great-grandchildren.

Colon cancer screening urged for all Canadians

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

In order to encourage more Canadians to get screened for colon cancer, March has been declared colorectal cancer awareness month by the Canadian Cancer Society.

Colon cancer is second to lung cancer as the largest cause of death in Canada and Ontario, and the third-largest cause of death after breast and lung cancer amongst women.

Dr. Michael Gould, a gastroenterologist and president of Vaughan Endoscopy Clinic, said colonoscopies have been recognized as the best way to screen for colon cancer, because polyps can be removed on the spot.

The awareness month was initiated in the past decade, he said, because the Cancer Society wanted to stress the importance of screening.

"About 30 per cent of patients have polyps, and there is a six per cent chance of getting colon cancer. We stress the importance of colonoscopies, because all tumours start as polyps. If they're removed, they won't turn into cancer."

The biggest obstacle in getting the message across, Gould said, is that people are afraid of the test. "I admit, it's not easy, but the preparation has improved because new 'drinks' have been developed to help clean out the colon.

"During the 30-minute procedure, in which a video camera attached to a long tube is steered up the colon, patients are sedated and there are no tubes. They sleep for a few minutes afterward, and it's done. Most people leave fine, and are back at work the next day."

He said only about 25 per cent of the population get screened.

"Most are afraid of the procedure, but it's important, and it's not a big deal. If it comes out normal, they don't have to return for at least five years," he added.

"It is something that most people don't want to talk about. Who wants to discuss their colon, or their bowel movements?"

PASSOVER FOOD IDEAS

Pan pals share their favourite recipes

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

At this time each year, most cooks start searching through their cookbooks and recipe clippings, ask friends and family for suggestions and get busy searching the Internet for Passover recipes. Pesach desserts are always a special challenge.

I love to share the special recipes that my "pan pals" have shared with me. So here are some delightful desserts that I hope you will prepare and share with your friends and family this Passover – and in the future! Some of my favourite cookbook authors shared these with me from the cookbooks they've authored. I've also included one of my favourite recipes as well. Enjoy!

So, if you are invited to a friend or family member's home for Passover, why not bring them a copy of a cookbook authored by one of my special "pan pals"? There's no better way to say thank you!

* * *

My friend Estee Kafra of Toronto is a talented, creative cook and food photographer, and we often share recipes and ideas with each other. Here are two terrific recipes from her latest cookbook, Cooking with Color, which she recently published. The first recipe is fruit-based and the second is somewhat decadent, but both are quite easy to prepare.

ESTEE'S CHAROSET-INSPIRED COMPOTE

This refreshing dessert is inspired by charoset, a staple of the Pesach seder. You can try adding some pears for a nice variation. The recipe can be doubled or tripled as many times as necessary, but don't use more than 2 or 3 cinnamon sticks.

2 cups water
1/2 cup sugar
1/4 cup red wine (dry or semi-sweet)
1 1/2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1 cinnamon stick
4 Cortland apples, peeled and cut into small wedges

Candied Walnut Topping:

1/2 cup sugar
2 to 3 tbsp. water
1 1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon
2 cups chopped walnuts

Bring water, sugar and red wine to a light boil in a saucepan. Add lemon juice and cinnamon stick and lower heat. Add apples, cover and let simmer for 20 minutes or until apples just begin to fall apart.

Turn off the heat and let apples cool inside the covered saucepan. Remove cinnamon stick and refrigerate apple mixture until ready to serve. Serve chilled with candied walnuts.

More food choices than you think

As spring approaches, Jews worldwide anticipate the festival of Passover, when we celebrate the ancient Hebrews' liberation from slavery more than 3,000 years ago.

We extend invitations to the seders, make lists, plan menus, and clean our houses, in anticipation of the eight-day festival.

Passover food varies, depending on where we live and where we come from, but for everyone it plays a central role in the celebration. Whether we are Sephardi or Ashkenazi, we look for dishes that adhere to our own traditions.

When we think about Passover food, we often think about what we cannot eat – all the food items that are chametz. Passover menus, however, can be chockfull of dishes that we can eat, such as fruits, vegetables and all our favourite meats poultry and fish.

In our upcoming food pages, we want to help you find some recipes that will prove that Passover can be a holiday that is about what you can eat.

Whether you've been making seders for years or planning your first one, you'll be sure to find some recipes that will enhance your holiday.

The ingredients in all our recipes are acceptable for Passover use, and can be purchased kosher for Passover in most large Jewish communities.

From all of us at The CJN, enjoy your Passover meals, and we wish you a chag kasher v'samayach.

– Carolyn Blackman

For the Candied Walnut Topping, preheat oven to 350. Stir together the sugar, water and cinnamon in a bowl. Add walnuts and use a wooden spoon to mix lightly until walnuts are evenly coated.

Spread walnuts on a parchment-lined cookie sheet and bake for 10 minutes. Toss or mix lightly to recoat the nuts, and bake for 5 to 10 minutes longer. Mix again immediately after taking out of the oven. Sprinkle over compote at serving time. Yield: 4 to 6 servings.

ESTEE'S COCONUT CUPS WITH CREAMY GANACHE FILLING

Coconut and chocolate seem to be a match made in heaven. This delicacy is perfect for Pesach, but of course can be used as a special treat all year round. While these appear to be fancy and intricate, they are actually quite simple to make and freeze well. For the best flavour, try to ensure that your ground coconut is fresh.

Macaroon Cups:
2 1/4 cups desiccated or shredded coconut
1/2 cup sugar
2 egg whites
Ganache Filling:
4 oz. chocolate (bittersweet)
1/2 cup margarine
3 egg yolks, lightly beaten
3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa

Preheat oven to 280. Grease compartments of a non-stick mini-muffin pan very well.

For the Macaroon Cups, mix the ingredients together in a bowl. Press mixture against the sides and bottom of each muffin compartment. Cover each compartment evenly and fully, and try to ensure that the bottom isn't too thick. (You can wet your fingers occasionally to help you press the coconut mixture in easily.)

Bake for 30 minutes, then let cool completely before removing Macaroon Cups from the pan. You may need to run a sharp knife around the top edges of each cup to loosen.

For Ganache Filling, melt chocolate and margarine together in the top of a double boiler, and stir to mix. Remove from heat and let cool for 2 to 3 minutes.

Stir in egg yolks while whisking thoroughly to prevent them from cooking. Add cocoa and mix well. Pour mixture while it is still warm into coconut cups and leave at room temperature to set. Store in airtight container. Yield: 12 cups.

I met Joanne and Harvey Caras when they were in Toronto recently at an evening sponsored by Chabad on Bayview. Joanne shared a recipe from The Holocaust Survivor Cookbook, a very special fundraising project that has raised over half a million dollars to date for Jewish charities.

Joanne wrote, "If you are having the seder at your house, prepare one or two of the Passover recipes in The Holocaust Survivor Cookbook. Then do what my family does, have someone at the seder read aloud the story of the survivor whose recipe was used. What a wonderful and meaningful addition to your seder this will be!

ELLEN WOLF'S MATZAH LAYER CAKE

5 oz. bittersweet chocolate
1 oz. cocoa
2 egg yolks
6 oz. butter or margarine
1/2 cup sugar
5 to 7 matzahs
5 oz. liquid (wine or coffee)

Melt chocolate and cocoa together on low heat, stirring often. Let cool. Beat egg yolks with butter and sugar. Mix chocolate and cocoa into the beaten butter mixture to form a spread.

Brush each matzah with coffee or wine. (Place matzah on a plate first for easier handling.) Then spread with a layer of chocolate spread mix. Add next matzah to the top and repeat.

Continue until all chocolate spread mix is used, ending with chocolate. Cover and refrigerate. Serves 6 to 8.

Note from Norene: I've edited this recipe slightly to clarify some details. People with compromised immune systems (e.g., the elderly, pregnant women) are hesitant to eat recipes made with raw eggs. However, the recipe survived and the contributor survived, so that says a lot!

My "pan pal" Barbara Wasser of Niskayuna, N.Y., shared this excellent dessert recipe – it's one of her favourites. Barbara is the co-author of Divine Kosher Cuisine: Catering to Family and Friends. This award-winning cookbook is a fundraising project for Congregation Agudat Achim in the upstate New York town of Niskayuna.

Barbara wrote, "This dessert is pareve and gluten-free too, so it can be made all year round. These rolls are not hard to make but do take a little patience. I've been serving this dessert since 1980, and we can't have a seder without it. One year I didn't make it and had very unhappy guests and family. Even those who don't usually eat much in the way of desserts wait all year for this one!"

Beat yolks at high speed with electric mixer 10 minutes or until thick and lemon colored. Melt margarine with chocolate. Stir until smooth and cool slightly. Add chocolate to yolks and beat until thick.

Cake:
7 large eggs, separated
14 tbsp.confectioners' sugar, divided
6 tbsp. potato starch
1/2 cup cocoa powder, sifted
1 tsp. kosher for Passover baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
cocoa, kosher for Passover confectioners' sugar and potato starch for rolling

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 12 x 18 x 1-in. baking pan. Line with parchment paper and grease again.

Beat yolks on high speed with electric mixer 10 minutes until thick and lemon-coloured. Add 8 tablespoons sugar.

Combine potato starch, cocoa and baking powder. Fold mixture into yolks.

Whip whites with salt in separate bowl on high speed with electric mixer until foamy. Add remaining sugar and continue beating until stiff peaks form.

Fold whites gently into chocolate mixture and spread into pan. Bake 6 minutes, rotate pan 180° and bake additional 5 to 6 minutes or until cake pulls away from sides. Cool 2 minutes and run knife along sides of pan.

Spread large dampened linen towel or tablecloth on surface and sprinkle with equal amounts of cocoa, sugar and potato starch. Remove parchment and roll from 18-inch side. Cool slightly.

Unroll cake, cut away any hard edges, and spread with three-fourths filling, leaving 1/2-in. border on sides and 1 inch at top. Roll-up cake and decorate with remaining filling. Chill and slice when filling is firm. Freezes well. Yield: 14 to 16 slices.

And of course, this article wouldn't be complete without adding one of my favourite Passover recipes. It comes from my book The Food Processor Bible (first published as Pleasures of Your Processor). I usually omit the nuts when I make it because my son Steven is allergic to them. My seven-year-old grandson Max really loves marshmallows and so do I. Whenever I visit my family in Montreal, Max usually exclaims, "Bubbie Norene's coming – quick, hide the marshmallows!"

NORENE'S FARFEL MARSHMALLOW TREATS
Source: The Food Processor Bible

Guaranteed to please the kids, both big and small!

1/4 cup butter or margarine
5 cups Passover marshmallows
1 cup walnuts or almonds
5 cups matzah farfel
1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon
1 cup chocolate chips, melted

Melt butter or margarine on low heat in a large pot. Add marshmallows and stir until melted. Remove from heat.

Steel Blade: Chop nuts with quick on/off pulses, until finely chopped. Add half the nuts to marshmallow mixture. Reserve remaining nuts for garnish. Stir in matzah farfel and cinnamon. Mix well. Spread evenly in sprayed 9 x 13-inch pan. Wet your hands and pat down evenly.

Drizzle melted chocolate over farfel mixture. Sprinkle with reserved nuts. Cool until chocolate is set. Cut into squares. Yield: 4 dozen squares. Freezes well.

Birthdays take the cake!

By RANDY FINGRUT
Special to The CJN

If Passover has the chutzpah to interfere with birthday plans or a family celebration, you may be feeling a little downhearted. Since the secular calendar we follow in our day to day lives differs completely from the Jewish calendar, these differences may cause a birthday to fall on Passover every few years, and about once a decade to fall directly on a seder night.

But there's no reason that you should pass over the marvel of any personal festivity. Birthdays and other occasions can be enjoyed over Passover, regardless of the dietary requirements of the holiday. With a few great recipes, and a little preparation, you can ensure that you will have an outstanding time.

EXQUISITE CHOCOLATE TRUFFLE CAKE

Lighter than air and bursting with flavour, this cake is a sure way to put anyone celebrating a birthday on Cloud 9. The cake itself is pareve, but it can be dressed with an incredibly rich chocolate cream icing. Alternatively, it can remain pareve garnished with a drizzle of melted bittersweet chocolate and topped with fresh raspberries.

8 oz. bittersweet chocolate, broken into small pieces
5 tbsp. Passover margarine, plus margarine to grease pan
5 egg yolks
2/3 cup sugar
1/4 cup orange juice
6 egg whites

Grease a 9-inch spring form pan with margarine, and place a greased parchment paper circle on bottom of pan. Fill a 9-inch Pyrex dish 3/4 full of water and place on lower rack of a 350-degree oven.

Chocolate, lemon, even charoset for cakes

Melt margarine in microwave in a covered bowl, on high power for about one minute. Add broken chocolate to margarine and continue on high power for one more minute. Stir mixture until smooth and set aside.

In a large bowl, beat egg yolks using an electric mixer on high. Slowly add 1/3 cup sugar and continue to beat until mixture has tripled in volume.

In a second bowl with clean beaters, beat egg whites on medium. Slowly add remainder of sugar and continue beating on high until soft peaks form.

Fold the chocolate into the yolks until blended. Gently fold egg whites into chocolate mixture, a bit at a time, until blended. Transfer mixture to prepared spring form pan. Bake on middle rack of oven, over pan of water, about 50 minutes. Cake is done when tester comes out with a few moist crumbs. Cool cake on rack. Cake will fall as it cools.

When cool, run a small offset spatula between the cake and outside of pan. Remove pan sides. Place a flat platter on top of cake and turn cake over. Remove pan bottom and parchment paper.

Chocolate truffle cake

Chocolate Cream Icing

8 oz. bittersweet chocolate, broken into small pieces
2 cups whipping cream

In a medium sized bowl, melt the chocolate in the microwave for one minute at high heat, then stir until melted. Let the chocolate cool for three to five minutes. The chocolate should be warm and still liquid but not hot. Whip the cream until soft peaks form. Stir 1/3 of the whipped cream into the chocolate. Fold the chocolate mixture into the remaining whipped cream. There will be enough icing to generously ice the top of the cake and to pipe a design around the top outside edge of the cake. Keep refrigerated.

LEMON TART IN A MACAROON SHELL

Each luscious bite of lemon is silky while simultaneously sweet and tart, and the shell is remarkably chewy.

Macaroon Shell

3 cups shredded coconut
3 egg whites
zest of one lemon
1 1/2 cups kosher for Passover icing sugar (or 1-1/2 cups sugar less 1-1/2 tbsp., plus 1-1/2 tbsp. potato starch pulsed until fine in processor or blender.)

Grease a 10-in. pie pan with margarine.

In medium bowl, combine coconut, egg whites, lemon zest and icing sugar. Pat mixture into pan and up the sides. Bake at 375 for 20 minutes, or until golden. Shell may be puffy. Carefully press it down into place and cool.

Lemon Filling

3 egg yolks
1 egg, whole
3/4 cup sugar
1/2 cup margarine, melted
1/2 cup fresh lemon juice
zest of two lemons

In a medium bowl, whisk together eggs and sugar. Add melted margarine, lemon juice and zest. Pour combined mixture into baked macaroon shell.

Bake at 350 for 20 minutes. Cool on rack, then refrigerate.

CHAROSET CAKE

Delightfully moist! A satisfying end to any Passover meal.

Filling

4 firm apples, peeled, cored and finely chopped
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1/2 cup walnuts, chopped
1/4 teaspoon cinnamon
2 tbsp. sugar or honey
3 tbsp. Concord grape wine

Cake

2 eggs
1 cup vegetable oil
1 cup sugar
1 1/2 cups matzah meal
1/2 cup potato starch
zest of two lemons

Grease a 9-inch angel food pan. Place a donut-shaped, greased parchment paper on bottom of pan. In a medium size bowl, mix apples with lemon juice. Add nuts, cinnamon, sugar and wine.

In a second bowl using an electric mixer, beat eggs and combine oil and sugar. Add matzah meal, potato starch and lemon zest, and mix until smooth. Layer prepared angel food pan with 1/2 cake batter, the charoset and then the remaining cake batter. Bake at 350 for 45-50 minutes, or until tester comes out clean. Cool completely on a rack. When cool, run a small offset spatula between cake and outside of pan, and between cake and centre of pan. Jiggle cake until it becomes loose from all sides. Cover pan with a plate and turn upside down to release cake. Remove parchment paper. Garnish by dusting with 1/4 cup Passover icing sugar (or process 1/4 cup sugar, less 3/4 teaspoon sugar plus 3/4 teaspoon potato starch).

Passover Food Ideas

Vegetarian ideas when pasta is not an option

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

Festivities and holidays can present a daunting challenge to those whose family members or guests are vegetarians. Especially when your university-aged child returns home and unexpectedly (as your brisket is simmering away in the oven!) advises you that he/she won't be eating meat any more. That's exactly what my 11-year-old did this past August upon returning home from summer camp.

I had to adapt and adapt rather quickly if I didn't want him eating pasta three times a day. Seders, and the rest of the meals during the holiday, are notoriously protein-based with the options usually being either roast chicken, brisket or tzimmes with carrots and yet more beef. Even the soothing and lovingly simmered chicken soup can be problematic for diehard vegetarians. So, to help feed my own child and hopefully assist you in offering up delicious options, I've developed four easy to make but no less scrumptious vegetarian options for the eight days of Passover. You might even find that they become a mainstay during the rest of the year as well.

CARROT AND APPLE SOUP

This comforting and super easy soup can be frozen with excellent results. It's a terrific alternative to chicken soup and then, of course, can additionally be used during the rest of the holidays as a first course.

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 cup sliced shallots
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. each ground ginger, dried thyme and pepper
1 1/2 lb. carrots, peeled and cut into chunks
1 potato, peeled and cut into chunks
1 apple, peeled, cored and cut into chunks
2 cups vegetable stock
crumbled apple chips

In Dutch oven set over medium heat, heat oil. Add shallots, salt, ginger, thyme and pepper; cook, stirring, for 3 minutes or until softened. Stir in carrots, potato and apple until well coated. Pour in vegetable stock and 1 cup water. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer, covered, for about 20 minutes or until vegetables are very tender. In batches, puree in blender until smooth. Return to pot to heat through. Serve garnished with crumbled apple chips. Makes 6 servings.

BUTTERNUT SQUASH AND SPINACH 'LASAGNA'

I simply adore this recipe. The squash makes this faux lasagna amazingly sweet while the reduced cream with the spinach provides a rich undertone. In a pinch, you can substitute 3 packages (10 oz. each) frozen chopped spinach for the fresh spinach.

3 lb. fresh spinach, stems removed
3 tbsp. butter
1 cup chopped onion
4 cloves garlic, minced
1 tsp.salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
1 cup whipping cream
1 butternut squash, peeled
1/2 cup grated Parmiggiano Reggiano or Parmesan cheese

Wash spinach under cool running water. With just the water clinging to the leaves, cook in large skillet over medium high heat, adding a handful at a time and turning with tongs, until wilted, about 5 minutes. Drain in colander. Thoroughly squeeze all excess moisture out of spinach. Chop coarsely; set aside.

In same skillet, heat butter over medium heat. Add onions, garlic, salt and pepper and cook, stirring, for about 5 minutes or until softened. Pour in cream. Bring to boil. Boil gently for about 5 minutes or until slightly thickened. Stir in spinach; set aside.

Meanwhile, cut bottom bulb part of squash apart from solid neck section; reserve for another use. Slice squash lengthwise into long slices about 1/8-in. thick. Layer bottom of 3 quart casserole or gratin dish with single layer of squash slices. Cover with 1/3 of spinach mixture. Continue layering squash and spinach mixture, for a total of 4 squash layers and 3 spinach layers, ending with squash. Sprinkle with Parmesan cheese. (Lasagna can be assembled to this point and refrigerated, covered, for up to 24 hours. Bring to room temperature before continuing.)

Cover casserole with piece of waxed or parchment paper and place on baking sheet. Bake in centre of preheated oven at 400 for 30 minutes. Remove waxed paper. Bake for an additional 15 minutes or until golden brown. Let stand for 10 minutes before serving. Serves 8.

GRILLED PORTOBELLO STACKS

These "open faced sandwiches" are a terrific and simple lunch idea for the holidays.

1/4 cup olive oil
8 medium Portobello mushrooms, stems trimmed
1/2 cup prepared pesto
8 slices roasted red pepper
4 oz. soft goat cheese, crumbled

Brush mushrooms evenly with olive oil. On grill or grill pan, cook, turning often, for 10 to 15 minutes or until very soft. Transfer to baking sheet, grill side up. Spread pesto evenly over mushrooms. Lay 1 slice of roasted pepper over each one. Sprinkle evenly with goat cheese. Broil 2 to 3 minutes or until cheese is melted and light golden. Serve immediately. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Cauliflower and asparagus stew

CURRIED CAULIFLOWER AND ASPARAGUS STEW

2 tbsp. olive oil
2 cups chopped onions
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 tbsp. curry powder
1 tbsp. honey
3/4 tsp. cumin
1/2 tsp. each salt and pepper
1/4 tsp. ground coriander
1 head cauliflower, trimmed and cut into florets
1 can (19 oz.) stewed or diced tomatoes
1 can (14 oz.) coconut milk
1 lb. asparagus, trimmed and cut into bite-size pieces
1/4 cup chopped fresh coriander

In Dutch oven set over medium heat, heat oil. Add onions and garlic; cook, stirring, for about 10 minutes or until golden. Stir in curry powder, honey, cumin, salt, pepper and coriander for 1 minute. Stir in cauliflower until well coated. Pour in tomatoes and coconut milk. Bring to boil. Reduce heat and simmer, uncovered, for about 20 minutes or until cauliflower is soft and liquid has been reduced slightly. Stir in asparagus. Cook for 3 to 5 minutes or until asparagus is bright green and tender but firm. Transfer to serving dish. Sprinkle with chopped fresh coriander. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Pesach rocks !!!

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

Preparing for Pesach is like being in the garment business: both work at least one season ahead.

As the last Chanukah candle flickers out, the dreaded P-word – and it's not Purim – creeps out of the shadows. By January, cookie crumbs are being taken down in chametz raids. And February barely turns the corner before popcorn is banned altogether.

But paranoia arrived early this year, thanks to the first days of Pesach being a rare no show in April.

Deadlines were moved up, but it's hard to get psyched with a mop and a jug of Murphy Vegetable Oil Soap when snow's on the ground. The big question? To do or not to do the windows. With the meter still ticking on winter, the windows can wait.

But it hardly matters when the starting pistol goes off. Until the last nano-second, you'll find me on my knees, washing something. If the experts advise us to "work smart," why not also "clean smart"? So this year, I'm heading to my local "house despot" store for a roll of the medium-weight paper renovators use to protect floors while they work. My plan: wash the kitchen floor in advance, cover and rip away the paper at erev yom tov's opening bell.

Actually, I don't mind the holiday's scutwork. This is my mantra, and make it yours too: be grateful for health, happiness and a roof over your head to clean.

But let's face it, Pesach cleaning is a project, and an exhausting one. To start my engines and keep them running, I rely on rock music. And nothing does it like the Rolling Stones, whose song titles can be an uncanny fit for the tasks (and mood) at hand.

So, here's to the greatest rock 'n' roll band ever, one that I'm sure never considered the sub-text of Pesach in its music. Herewith my favourites:

- Start Me Up (what else?)
- Time Is On My Side (that was my tune two months ago)
- 19th Nervous Breakdown (and there's more where that came from)
- The Last Time (making a vat of home-made gefilte fish)
- Satisfaction (when a room earns your Good-Cleaning Seal of Approval)
- Ain't Too Proud To Beg (my husband for help)
- Beast Of Burden (couldn't have said it better myself)
- Mixed Emotions (love the holiday food – dread the extra pounds)
- Too Tough (is it just me or is the fridge heavier to move this year?)
- Let It Bleed (what's another two-inch gash on the head from banging into walls?)
- It's All Over Now (until next year, but with a double Adar, that's almost 13 months away!)
- If You Really Want To Be My Friend (you'll take me to a hotel next Pesach)

This year, I've decided to add dairy to the menu to break the monotony of fish. We eat a version of this eggplant dish often during the year – should be nice with crunchy matzah.

YUMMY EGGPLANT

Wash and cut a medium eggplant into small dice, leaving the peel on. (After discarding two inches from the top, you should have a five-inch long eggplant to work with). Line an oven pan with foil, shpritz with Pesach cooking oil spray and scatter the dice on top. Brush very lightly – and I mean lightly – with oil and bake at 375 until brown, soft and slightly crispy. (Check after half an hour and keep checking every 10 minutes. Watch that it doesn't burn).

In a large skillet, put a medium peeled and diced Yukon gold or red potato. Add a small chopped red onion, a seeded, chopped red pepper and 1-1/4cups of tinned tomatoes with juice. If tomatoes are whole, break them up in the pan. (If this product is not available, use some tomato juice and chopped fresh tomatoes.)

Mix in the following spices: garlic powder (to your taste), a dash of black pepper, one teaspoon of ground cumin (more if you prefer). Add one tablespoon chopped flatleaf Italian parsley. Stir in 1/2 cup of good quality tomato sauce and 1/2 cup of water.

Simmer about 15 to 20 minutes, covered, until potatoes are soft. Stir occasionally, adding more water or tomato juice if necessary to prevent sticking. You should have a nice sauce, but not too runny. Remove from heat, stir in eggplant and crumble in a one-inch chunk of feta cheese. Adjust seasonings if you want.

Serve immediately, but I think it tastes best warm, not hot. Serves two as a main course, four as an appetizer.

You can eat healthy during the holiday

By JENNIFER LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

Marni Wasserman, chef and cooking teacher, tells her students that eating healthy during Passover can be simple and delicious.

"It can be done with foods many people already eat throughout the rest of the year," she says.

A graduate of the Institute of Holistic Nutrition in Toronto as well as a certified chef from The Natural Gourmet Culinary Institution in New York City, Wasserman is founder of Delicious Knowledge, a two-year-old company that focuses on teaching people about and how to cook whole foods.

"Whole foods are those that are as close to nature as possible. They are unprocessed and unrefined, or processed and refined as little as possible, before being consumed. Whole foods typically do not contain added ingredients, such as sugar, salt or fat. Eating during Passover does not mean you need to give up those ideals," Wasserman says.

"During Passover, many people seem to think they have no choice but to indulge in heavy meal after heavy meal. By cooking with fresh ingredients, such as vegetables or small amounts of fish or chicken, people can avoid the mostly packaged products that are made specifically for the holiday. Not only are these items often more expensive than fresh ingredients, but they are also filled with processed ingredients."

Each March, Wasserman holds a cooking class in her home where she teaches people innovative and healthy Passover recipes that they can serve during the seders or throughout the rest of the week.

She says this is a great opportunity for people to try new ingredients such as quinoa, or leafy green vegetables such as kale or collard greens.

QUINOA WITH PORCINI MUSHROOMS AND CURRANTS

1 cup quinoa
2 cups water or vegetable broth
salt
3/4 cup dried porcini mushrooms
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 cup minced red onion
1 garlic clove
1 stalk celery
1 cup dried currants
1/2 cup toasted pinenuts or pecans freshly ground pepper
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley or thyme

Rinse quinoa and place in large pot and dry toast on a low heat for a few minutes. Add 2 cups of water and bring to a boil with salt. Reduce heat and simmer for 15 minutes.

Combine 1 cup of water with porcini mushrooms in a small saucepan and bring to a boil. Remove the pan from the heat and let the mushrooms soak for 20 minutes. Then drain the mushrooms, reserving the mushrooms and the liquid separately. Roughly chop the mushrooms.

Warm the olive oil in a medium pan over medium-low heat. Add the onions and celery and cook until the vegetables are soft, about 7 minutes.

Add the reserved mushrooms, the garlic and the currants and saute until the currants are heated through, about 2 minutes.

Add the pinenuts, quinoa, salt and black pepper to taste, and the mushroom soaking liquid. Cook until the liquid has been absorbed, about 2 minutes. Stir in the chopped parsley and serve hot.

SIMPLE COLLARDS WITH PORTOBELLO MUSHROOMS

6-7 cups chopped collard greens
2 cups water
2 tsp. minced garlic
1/3 cup thinly sliced scallions
2-3 portobello mushrooms, cut into thin slices olive oil to taste at the end
salt to taste

Wash collards, remove stalks and stack 4-5 leaves. Roll like a cigar and slice into thin ribbons. To cook collards, place water in skillet with a lid. Bring to a boil and add the prepared collards. Cover and cook over high heat for 8-10 minutes, stirring occasionally. Drain in a colander and set aside.

Heat the oil in same skillet over medium heat. Add the garlic and scallions and saute for about 30 seconds. Turn the heat to medium high and add the mushrooms and a pinch of sea salt to draw out some liquid. Cook for 5-6 minutes, stirring constantly until mushrooms are tender.

Reduce heat to low, stir in cooked collards, cover and cook for 1-2 minutes until hot.

Why collards? They are good sources of vitamin C and soluble fibre and contain multiple nutrients with potent anti-cancer properties.

Passover Food Ideas

Vegetables dress up the meal

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

Passover falls a tad early this year – although as Carolyn Blackman, talented food editor of The CJN has remarked, Passover never falls early or late, it's always right on time! – making the pickings for local vegetables somewhat light.

I've chosen to navigate the season bemusedly this March, treading between deep winter favourites such as beets and carrots, and heartier year-round fare such as cucumbers. Fennel and mint are a classic Italian pair, and here, with sweet roasted beets, make a winning combination. You will need a blade slicer with a 1/4-inch julienne blade to make the cucumber noodles, but it's well worth the purchase to enjoy these faux but utterly delicious "noodles." Sweet, honey glazed carrots never fail to win rave reviews.

CUCUMBER NOODLES

3 seedless cucumbers
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil

Trim ends of cucumbers. Using a blade slicer with a 1/4-inch julienne blade, cut each cucumber into long 1/4-inch julienne strips, slicing until you reach the core. Then rotate the cucumber a quarter turn and continue slicing and rotating until only the core is left. Bring large pot of lightly salted water to a boil. Blanche cucumber noodles for 1 minute. Drain and refresh under cold running water to stop the cooking.

In large skillet, heat oil over medium high heat. Add cucumber, lemon juice, salt and pepper. Cook, tossing gently for about 2 minutes or until "noodles" are heated through. Transfer to serving bowl. Sprinkle with basil. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

ROASTED BEETS WITH FENNEL AND MINT

Fennel is kitniyot, but if you are not Sephardi, feel free to omit it and increase the mint to 2 tbsp. It will still be delicious, since the stars of the dish are the beets anyway.

3 large beets, trimmed
1 tbsp. sherry vinegar
1/2 tsp. fennel seeds, crushed
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 tbsp. chopped fresh mint

Tightly wrap beets in double thickness of foil; place on baking sheet. Roast in centre of preheated 425 oven for 1 to 1-1/2 hours or until very tender. Cool. (Beets can be made up to 2 days ahead.)

Whisk together vinegar, fennel seeds, mint, salt and pepper. Gradually whisk in oil until mixture is well emulsified.

When beets are cool enough to handle, peel and cut into thin slices. Fan slices around serving bowl. Drizzle vinaigrette over. Sprinkle with basil. Serve at room temperature. Makes 6 servings.

Nuclear Iran would threaten U.S. as well as Israel: Biden

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Obama administration has boosted U.S. defence ties to Israel and will close ranks with its ally against any threat from a nuclear-armed Iran, U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden said Monday prior to a trip to Israel.

Biden arrived in Israel Monday afternoon to deliver a message to the Israeli public about U.S.-Israel relations, the Iranian nuclear program and the Middle East peace process.

The most senior U.S. official to visit Israel since President Barack Obama took office in January 2009, Biden is widely expected to caution his hosts not to attack Iran preemptively while world powers pursue fresh sanctions against Tehran.

In an interview with the Israeli newspaper Yedioth Ahronoth, Biden emphasized Washington's efforts to place greater international diplomatic pressure on the Iranians, as well as unilateral measures imposed by the U.S. treasury.

Asked about the prospect of an Israeli attack, he said, "Though I cannot answer the hypothetical questions you raised about Iran, I can promise the Israeli people that we will confront, as allies, any security challenge it will face. A nuclear-armed Iran would constitute a threat not only to Israel, it would also constitute a threat to the United States."

Meanwhile, Defence Minister Ehud Barak said Monday that Iran does not yet pose an existential threat to Israel.

"Iran isn't an existential threat to Israel at the moment, but it has the potential to develop into one, and we are working to prevent that," said Barak, speaking before the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee.

Biden, however, emphasized the Iranian threat and reiterated the U.S. commitment to Israel. The Obama administration "gives Israel annual military aid worth $3 billion," Biden said. "We revived defence consultations between the two countries, doubled our efforts to ensure Israel preserves its qualitative military edge in the region, expanded our joint exercises and co-operation on missile-defence systems."

Israel, which is believed to have the region's only atomic arsenal, bombed Iraq's nuclear reactor in 1981, and in 2007, launched a similar sortie against Syria.

Those tactical challenges and U.S. reluctance to see a new regional war have led some analysts to predict Israel will eventually come round to a strategy of "containing" Iran, which denies its controversial uranium enrichment is for bombs.

Biden, who was scheduled to be in Israel until Thursday, was not expected to take part in indirect Israeli-Palestinian talks that would be spearheaded by Obama's special envoy, George Mitchell and could be announced during his visit. Biden will, however, be briefed on them.

U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden [File photo]

U.S.-Israeli tensions flared over Obama's early push for a complete freeze on settlement construction in the West Bank.

Obama has since embraced a more limited 10-month moratorium on new building announced by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in November.

Obama has been trying to reach out to the Muslim world, a priority he has highlighted with high-profile visits to Egypt and Saudi Arabia, and with a planned visit to Indonesia later this month.

"We certainly believe that when the United States effectively builds bridges with Muslim communities, this allows us to promote our interests, including interests that Israel benefits from," Biden told Yedioth Ahronoth.

"The construction freeze was a unilateral decision by the Israeli government, and it is not part of an agreement with the American administration or with the Palestinians," he said. "It's not everything that we wanted, but it's an important action that has significant impact on the ground."

Biden's meetings in Jerusalem were to begin Tuesday morning, when he was to meet with President Shimon Peres at the President's Residence in Jerusalem. He was then to visit Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his advisers at the prime minister's Jerusalem residence. Following a private session, the two leaders were to hold a joint press conference.

Biden is to address the Israeli public at Tel Aviv University on Thursday, when he is expected to discuss U.S.-Israel ties and Obama's vision for the peace process and for dealing with the Iranian nuclear threat.

Biden's Israel visit is a year too late

By ALUF BENN

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

I looked over the schedule for U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden's visit and found it hard to believe.

It included an extensive meeting as well as a more limited meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, dinner with the prime minister and his wife, Sara, at their official residence, a helicopter tour with Defence Minister Ehud Barak and a speech at Tel Aviv University.

A draft of his speech wasn't made available to me, but I'll go out on a limb and guess that Biden will expound on his declarations of love, support and limitless commitment to the security of Israel and its prosperity.

With so much attention, it's a shame he's arriving a year late – a year that his boss, President Barack Obama, wasted on fruitless diplomatic moves that only further compromised the shaky stature of the United States in the Middle East. Obama and his advisers expected the hand that he extended to the Arab world and Iran, the president's reference in his Cairo speech to passages from the Qur'an, and the public and demonstrable distance that he created from Israel would soften the Muslims and Arabs' residual hostility for the United States. It didn't work.

Columnist Maureen Dowd of the New York Times, who recently visited the Saudi capital, Riyadh, quoted a disappointed highly placed Saudi as saying: "Things are worse now than before, because our hopes were so high after Cairo." The Iranians have ignored Obama's gestures of friendship and subsequent threat of sanctions, and have simply continued to pursue their nuclear program.

In Israel, Obama has aroused concern that on the one hand he would exert heavy pressure and hit American aid to Israel in order to expedite an Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and the establishment of a Palestinian state; and on the other hand that the United States will reconcile itself to an Iranian nuclear bomb. The Israelis, who'd gotten used to pampering and special gestures from former presidents Bill Clinton and George W. Bush, suddenly sensed they didn't have a friend in the White House.

Biden's visit is designed to open a new chapter in relations between Netanyahu and the U.S. administration, with a two-fold message: recognition of the political importance of Israel and its supporters in America in advance of the November Congressional elections; and giving Netanyahu the credit he's not yet earned for his statement in support of "two states for two peoples" and his settlement construction freeze. He will get it now under the threat of a preemptive war against Iran.

Israel has a justifiable reputation as an apprehensive and nervous country – and as a serial attacker of nuclear reactors. To calm Israeli nerves and ensure that the Middle East is not set aflame, Obama has no choice but to use the tried and true methods of the past: supporting, stroking and promising loyalty.

Brown vows to change universal jurisdiction law

JTA

LONDON — British Prime Minister Gordon Brown said he will change legislation enabling Palestinian groups to obtain arrest warrants against Israeli political leaders on suspicion of war crimes.

However, in practice, the legislation is likely to wait until after a general election in the United Kingdom.

In the March 4 Daily Telegraph, Brown wrote that Britain is committed to "universal jurisdiction" in serious cases of war crimes. But he added that Britain must make sure that individuals with political interests can't have arrest warrants issued against foreign leaders in cases where there isn't sufficient evidence.

In order to overcome this problem, Brown announced March 4 that his government is considering changing the law to require the consent of the Public Prosecution Service prior to the issuance of such an arrest warrant.

Gordon Brown

Brown added that the government's suggestion will be put before the parliamentary justice committee. Justice Minister Jack Straw indicated the committee will have to present its conclusion to the government within one month. However, since the United Kingdom is on the verge of an election campaign, and the prime minister might announce the election date before the date the committee has to present its conclusion, it might be too late to enact the law before the election.

Israeli officials and military officers, unwilling to risk having an arrest warrant issued against them, have been avoiding the United Kingdom.

Britain wants to continue to be involved in the Middle East peace process, and the British government is aware that it would be marginalized if Israeli politicians refuse to visit Britain.

Israeli British Ambassador Ron Prosor welcomed Brown's announcement.

"We particularly concur that 'Britain cannot afford to have its standing in the world compromised for the sake of tolerating such gestures,'" he said, quoting from Brown's piece in the Telegraph.

The Conservative Party's spokesperson Justice, Dominic Grieve, said: "This morning Gordon Brown wrote in the Daily Telegraph that 'Britain cannot afford to have its standing in the world compromised' by spurious and politicized war crimes prosecutions. This afternoon, he kicked the whole issue into the long grass. The Conservatives would have supported him in resolving the problem, but he has chosen to duck it instead."

Fishing for Jews in Russia's muddy waters

By ANNA RUDNITSKAYA
JTA

MOSCOW — This spring, Howard Flower and his assistants plan to go to Russia's westernmost region, Kaliningrad, on a fishing expedition: they're fishing for Jews.

Flower, the aliyah director of the Russian office of the International Christian Embassy, a pro-Israel evangelical group, plans to look through telephone directories for Jewish-sounding names and meet with local leaders in an attempt to find far-flung Jews, some of whom might not even realize they're Jewish, and talk to them about moving to Israel.

Determining who is Jewish in Russia is more of an art than a science.

In the 2002 Russian census, the country's most recent, 233,000 Russians self-identified as Jews. Jewish leaders here and abroad consider the figure an underestimate, but can't agree on the actual figure or how to determine it.

"Anyone who works in Jewish organizations knows that the real number of Jews is higher than records show because many people do not receive any services and thus are not registered anywhere," said Rabbi Yosef Hersonski, head of the Khamovniki community in Moscow. "Probably they are not interested. But if their mother was Jewish, we consider them Jews."

One of Russia's chief rabbis, Berel Lazar, estimates the number of Jews in Russia at one million to two million; he considers as Jews all those with a Jewish mother. NCSJ, a U.S.-based advocacy group for Russian-speaking Jews, estimates that Russia has 400,000 to 700,000 Jews, and one to 1.5 million in the former Soviet Union as a whole.

A representative for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, the largest Jewish aid group active in Russia, declined to speculate on a figure.

"We have not yet found reliable data based on sound methodology about the number of Jews in Russia," JDC representative Rina Edelshtein said.

Across Russia, approximately 100,000 Jews are registered with their local Jewish community organizations. To be registered, one has to prove Jewishness.

It's often not a simple thing.

Official records tend to be a mess. In the Soviet era, ethnicity was delineated on adults' internal passports. Those with two Jewish parents were registered as Jewish, but the children of mixed marriages could choose the ethnicity of either parent. Since Jews suffered discrimination in the Soviet Union, the products of intermarriage usually did not register as Jewish.

The situation was captured best perhaps in a joke popular at the height of the Soviet Jews' struggle for immigration to Israel.

"How many Jews are there in the USSR?" Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev asks the head of the KGB.

"Two-and-a-half million," the KGB head replies. "But if we let them leave, there will be six million."

By the time the Iron Curtain fell and Soviet Jews obtained the right to emigrate, there were 1.8 million Jews in the Soviet Union, including 570,000 in Russia, according to 1989 census data. Most have left since then, moving to Israel, the United States and Germany.

The Israeli Embassy in Moscow says it knows only about those who qualify for aliyah, or immigration to Israel, under Israel's Law of Return. Under this criteria, anyone with a Jewish grandparent is eligible.

The Nativ organization, which deals with aliyah in the former Soviet Union, estimated that 530,000 Russians meet the criteria for aliyah, according to embassy spokesman Alex Goldman-Shaiman. How many are legitimately Jewish is unknown, he said.

Mark Tolts, a demographer at Hebrew University in Jerusalem and the author of the "Encyclopedia of Jews in Eastern Europe," estimates that only about 255,000 Jews live in Russia. He bases his figures on census data.

"If you speak of a million Jews, show me the method with which you counted them," Tolts said. "Given the proliferation of mixed marriages among the Jews of the former Soviet Union in the last generations, it is very difficult to empirically determine the number of Jews according to Halachah. Demographers base their figures on the statistic data they have. These are mainly census results, vital and migration statistics."

Tolts says that 1.5 million people did not state their nationality during the 2002 census; he guesses that at least 20,000 were Jews.

However, Tolts' figure of 255,000 refers only to the so-called "core Jewish population," the aggregate of those who, when asked, identify themselves as Jews or, in the case of children, are identified as such by their parents. It does not include those of Jewish origin who report another ethnicity in the census. Russian passports dropped the ethnicity field in 1994.

To complicate matters, some Russians of Jewish lineage are baptized yet still identify as Jews when asked about ethnicity.

"The main dilemma is who should be called Jews," said Mark Levin, the executive director of NSCJ.

Flowers, of the International Christian Embassy, called counting Russia's Jews "one of the trickiest questions facing man."

His organization recently provided the Jewish Agency for Israel with a list of 1.2 million people in Russia whose names sound Jewish, all of whom were found in online and print telephone directories.

In 2004, a similar list of 30,000 names among St. Petersburg residents was examined. The Jewish Agency chose 10,000 that seemed Jewish and called them. More than 2,000 expressed some interest either in immigrating to Israel or in Jewish community events, according to Flowers.

Along with halachic and ethnic standards, he said the methodology introduced a new way of counting Jews: "phonetically."

Israel warns Palestinian Authority

By AVI ISSACHAROFF AND AMOS HAREL

Israel has conveyed messages to the Palestinian Authority over the past few days that it must contain the popular protests that have recently erupted in the West Bank, stop PA officials from participating in them and keep them from turning violent, Palestinian sources told Ha'aretz.

They said Israel also told the PA it must reduce incitement regarding the Temple Mount and Jerusalem, and curtail its campaign against the use of Israeli products.

Israeli officials said that if the PA does not cut down on the incitement and keep the protests and boycott campaign in check, Israel will reduce cooperation with the PA and increase its arrests in Palestinian-controlled areas, the Palestinian sources said.

Over the past few months, arrests by Israel in PA areas have declined, and the Israel Defence Forces has been limiting the entry of troops into those areas.

The messages to the PA were delivered during several conversations between senior Israeli security officials and their Palestinian counterparts, as well as by political figures. The Palestinian sources said Shin Bet security service chief Yuval Diskin had discussed the matter with the PA official responsible for civil matters in the West Bank, Hussein al-Sheikh.

Mahmoud Abbas

The PA has sponsored several rallies in the villages of Bil'in and Na'alin, west of Ramallah, some of which have been attended by PA officials. In recent weeks, the PA has also backed protests in the village of Nebi Salah, north of Ramallah, and in Umm Salamuna in the Bethlehem region. Palestine Liberation Organization officials are prominently involved in clashes in the Jerusalem area and have come out against what the PA describes as the Judaization of Jerusalem.

In addition, PA President Mahmoud Abbas has spoken out sharply against the inclusion of Hebron's Tomb of the Patriarchs and Rachel's Tomb, near Bethlehem, in a list of Jewish heritage sites.

The PA has so far done nothing to curtail the protests and, as of Sunday, had conveyed no message to its grassroots activists to maintain a lower profile at upcoming rallies.

Dead Sea rises slightly

After years of drought-like conditions that saw the water level of the Dead Sea plummet by 15 metres, the water level rose by eight centimetres this winter, the Water Authority said. Water levels have also risen back to the critical "red line" in several subterranean aquifers for the first time in years, and the mountain and coastal aquifers have regained the water levels of last year. According to the Water Authority, this winter's rainfall has covered water deficits of the past year, but not the past five years. It noted Lake Kinneret's water level went up to the lower red line (213 metres) for the first time since July 2008.

Arab League backs talks

The Arab League agreed to support the resumption of indirect peace talks with Israel. The Arab foreign ministers at an Arab League meeting March 3 in Cairo agreed in principle to support four months of indirect talks between Israel and the Palestinians. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who was at this week's meeting, has said he would abide by the decision of the league's ministerial committee. Abbas has said he won't return to direct talks until Israel halts all settlement building in the West Bank and east Jerusalem. Talks have been stalled for more than a year. The league will meet in July to assess the talks' progress.

Rocks thrown from Temple Mount

Clashes broke out between Israeli police officers and Muslim rock throwers at the end of Friday prayers on the Temple Mount following a sermon on a recent Israeli decision to include two West Bank shrines on a list of national heritage sites. Rocks were thrown from the direction of the mosques above toward Jews praying below at the Western Wall plaza. Israeli police entered the Temple Mount compound to quell the rock throwing. The stone throwers retreated inside the Al-Aqsa Mosque. After talks with the Muslim Waqf, which administers the compound, police allowed worshippers to exit the area. Rocks were also thrown at police by young Arabs at several locations in east Jerusalem and the West Bank. A Waqf official said the clash followed a mosque sermon on Israel's decision to include Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron and Rachel's Tomb in Bethlehem as Jewish historical sites.

Weiss won't ordain female rabbis

JTA

NEW YORK — Rabbi Avi Weiss has backed away from the idea of ordaining women as Orthodox rabbis under the title "rabba."

Rabbi Weiss, a prominent modern Orthodox rabbi who guides the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale in the Bronx, had taken heat from the Orthodox community since he made the announcement in January that he would use the feminized version of rabbi for his student, Sara Hurwitz, who had been using the title "maharat."

The Rabbinical Council of America, an umbrella organization consisting mostly of modern Orthodox rabbis, had been considering expelling him from the organization, the New York Jewish Week reported, though the veracity of that report is still under debate.

But Rabbi Weiss, the founder and leader of the Yeshivat Chovevei Torah rabbinical school, and the RCA apparently have reached an agreement.

"It is not my intention or the intention of Yeshivat Maharat to confer the title of 'Rabba' upon its graduates," Rabbi Weiss said in a March 5 statement.

"Yeshivat Maharat prepares women for positions of religious leadership in the Orthodox community. Each student who completes its course of study in Tanach, Talmud, Halachah and Jewish thought, and is deemed fit by her faith, knowledge of our Mesoret, ethical integrity and temperament to assume positions of religious leadership in Orthodox institutions will be confirmed as manhigah hilkhatit, ruhanit, toranit (Maharat)."

The RCA concurred in its own statement, which it issued in conjunction with Rabbi Weiss'.

"We are gratified that during the course of these conversations, Rabbi Weiss concluded that neither he nor Yeshivat Maharat would ordain women as rabbis and that Yeshivat Maharat will not confer the title of 'Rabba' on graduates of their program," the organization wrote.

Comedian Joey Elias serves up first DVD

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Beloved Montreal comedy scene stalwart Joey Elias wants you to check out his douche bag. Not an actual one, mind you. Rather, his new DVD of the same name.

Though he's been performing standup comedy for 20 years, Elias is now releasing his inaugural video offering, titled Joey Elias: Douchebag! The Toronto DVD launch takes place March 17 at Absolute Comedy club (2335 Yonge St.), where he'll be touching off a four-night string of performances.

The Montreal launch was on March 4 at The Comedynest.

Five dollars from each sale of the $25 DVD are going to the Montreal Children's Hospital diabetes clinic. Elias said the rest of the money helps repay the cost of production.

Speaking to The CJN from Montreal last month, Elias said there was never any hurry to put out a DVD per se; instead it "just felt like the timing was good" and that any opportunity to benefit the children's diabetes clinic was one he would take.

So why call it Douchebag?

"It's from the last joke on the video. And honestly, it's not a bad word. It's an actual thing," Elias said.

Filmed live at Montreal's Studio Juste Pour Rire last October, the DVD showcases an hour of Elias at his witty best.

Fans of his comedic stylings will recognize some tried and true material from his many years on the comedy circuit. For instance, Elias' riff on his stints entertaining the troops in Afghanistan and what it means visiting them as a Jew never gets tired.

Douchebag! is also peppered with new gags, and features a lot more edge to Elias' delivery. To wit: his take on why it's never a good idea to fake a heart attack to gain quicker admission to a hospital – in this case, Montreal's Jewish General Hospital. To reveal any more than the premise here would ruin the joke.

Asked about his new attitude, Elias said that his mood at the time of filming was influenced by the bad breakup of a long-term relationship, as well as his recently diagnosed Type II diabetes and the terminal illness of a close friend.

"I brought [the diabetes] upon myself. I just didn't take care of myself and take family genetics and history into consideration," he said. "What I discovered from all this was what I call 'Angry Joey'. It's the closest I'll ever get to George Carlin. He'd rant and rave about stuff that bugged him. It took him 20 years to figure out that anger did work [in comedy]. It took me 15. So yeah, I'm a little more edgy, but I like to think that I say the things people think. At least, that's what I'd like to think. People seem to like it."

TORONTO AUTHOR JOSEPH KERTES TO RECEIVE U.S. JEWISH BOOK AWARD THIS WEEK IN NEW YORK

Toronto author Joseph Kertes is to receive the 2009 National Jewish Book Award in fiction in New York this week for his book, Gratitude.

The Hungarian-born Kertes, who founded Humber College's creative writing program and is dean of creative and performing arts at Humber, previously won a Canadian National Jewish Book Award for the book, a Holocaust story that was inspired by a family anecdote.

Kertes has said that the story "haunted me my whole life." Although the events happened before his time, he said he tried to shape them into a literary story with deeply imagined characters. "What the story says to me – and what I hope sets it apart from others on the subject – is that all of us – victims, perpetrators, Christians, Jews, saints and criminals alike – are capable of making mistakes with tragic consequences," he said on his website, www.josephkertes.com.

The award is one of the top honours awarded anywhere in the world for Jewish literature. Gratitude is published by Viking Canada – Penguin.

Drake gets three Juno nominations

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Toronto rapper Drake was nominated for three awards at last week's Juno nominations at the Royal York Hotel.

The singer, and former star of Degrassi: The Next Generation, was nominated for single of the year for Best I Ever Had; for rap recording of the year for his EP So Far Gone and for new artist of the year. The 24-year-old has yet to release a full-length album.

Aubrey Drake Graham is the son of Dennis Graham, a drummer who worked with Jerry Lee Lewis. Drake was raised by his Jewish mother in Toronto's Forest Hill neighbourhood and attended Forest Hill Collegiate Institute.

Sunplace, the debut CD from the Toronto group Jaffa Road, was nominated for world music album of the year. The group combines original and ancient poetry sung in Hebrew, Spanish and English with pulsating dub grooves, belly dance rhythms and ambient electronic textures.

Jaffa Road is made up of Aaron Lightstone, Aviva Chernick, Chris Gartner, Sundar Viswanathan and Jeff Wilson.

Meanwhile, Toronto producer and songwriter Howie Beck, who quipped in the Toronto Star that he'll be "putting the Jew in the Junos," was nominated for adult alternative album of the year for In Public.

The Juno Awards will be held in St. John's, Nfld., on April 17 and 18.

Bluish examines Jewish identity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Toronto Jewish Theatre's current production of Bluish is a calibrated celebration of Jewish identity.

Janece Shaffer's play, which is directed and produced by Ari Weisberg, deals with gradations of Jewishness within the context of an evolving romantic relationship.

Scheduled to run at the Toronto Centre for the Arts until March 14, it is ostensibly a comedy. But as is usually the case, the gentle humour masks issues that belie its levity.

Ben Kishman (Ron Boyd) and Beth Richardson (Melissa Battey-Pratt) are a young couple in love and on the cusp of matrimony. He is Jewish and she is a Christian. But in fact, she may be a member of the tribe.

Doubts about her identity arise after a medical test confirms that she is a Tay-Sachs carrier. Tay-Sachs, a genetic disorder, affects mainly Ashkenazi Jews.

Bluish, which is set on a fairly sparse stage consisting of a few pieces of unadorned furniture, explores the manner in which Ben and Beth cope with the sudden discovery that she's Jewish on her mother's side.

Ben doesn't really care whether his fiancée is Jewish. He may even be disappointed that he has bagged a Fran Drescher rather than a Grace Kelly.

The reason is clear. He's an atheist who has nothing more than a loose affiliation with Judaism, based on guilt and the horror of the Holocaust.

As he explains, "Well, there's blue and then there's blue-ish. Just like there's Jew and being Jew-ish."

Boyd, a skilled actor, conveys Ben's ambivalence effortlessly.

Beth's journey toward Judaism is not an easy one. After learning from Ben's inquisitive sister (Carrie Adelstein) that she is partially Jewish, Beth rides a mixture of emotions ranging from rejection to acceptance.

"I don't know who the hell I am," she says after the discovery is made courtesy of the Internet. "What do I know about being a Jew?"

But after randomly passing a lighted menorah in a window, visiting a synagogue with Ben's solicitous father (Bob Cooper) and warming up to Ben's brassy mother (Andria Siegler), Beth embraces Judaism, much to Ben's bemusement and confusion.

Beth completes her "conversion" by cooking a traditional Sabbath meal, baking a challah, lighting the candles and chanting a prayer.

"So pretty, huh?" she says, both mystifying and amazing Ben.

As Beth, Battey-Pratt is fairly convincing. Her chemistry with Boyd, however, leaves something to be desired, at least in the first half of the play. Until that juncture, the emotion that best sums her up is probably exasperation.

Nonetheless, Bluish works as an exploration of what it means to be Jewish in a modern, secular and frenetic society.

Melissa Battey-Pratt and Ron Boyd have lead roles in Bluish.

Music Project has chutzpah

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Ask Idan Raichel how well he plays the piano and he'll tell you he "really sucks."

You wouldn't know it to listen to his music, though, nor to watch him perform. He and five of the many musicians who form part of the Idan Raichel Project were the opening act of the annual Chutzpah Festival in Vancouver last Thursday.

Performing before a packed auditorium at the University of British Columbia's Chan Centre for Performing Arts, they filled the centre with the melodic sounds of music, influenced by Sudan, Ethiopia, Yemen, India and Israel.

Raichel, 32, has sold some 300,000 records since he released his first album eight years ago. He started out playing in bars and then as backup for other Israeli pop singers, but by 2002, he ventured out on his own, attracting a variety of musicians to a project that changes shape, style and sound with every song.

There are some 75 musicians who have participated in the project, some as young as 16 and others in their 80s. Raichel composes and arranges many of the tracks, plays the keyboard and collaborates with the other vocalists and musicians.

Idan Raichel

Although several of his songs are sung in Hebrew, Raichel is quick to point out that his is not a Jewish project. "Sure, we have Jewish influences. For example we had a cantor, Yehia Tsubara, join us for a few songs. But before anything else, I see myself as an Israeli artist. Not everyone in the group is Israeli, but it's definitely an Israeli project."

In Israel, the project is considered part of the mainstream music scene, while abroad it falls under the category of world music.

Raichel hopes to create a DVD of his music in the coming months, set in the shadow of the King David Tower in Jerusalem. "I'd like to play there and in-between the songs talk to people and discuss the music," he said. "I'm trying to find an interesting concept."

Raichel said he and his fellow musicians were incredibly jet-lagged after arriving in Vancouver via Seattle. After their one and only performance in Vancouver, they were off to Boston and New York, stopping briefly in Israel before heading to Europe.

Raichel said he was unfazed by the travel schedule. "You lose sense of time when you're on tour, and it's a great feeling – not exhausting at all," he said.

"Once you release an album and get a positive response, it changes your life," he added. "It's a great privilege to make a living from your art."

Stories spotlight Diaspora Jews in the Israeli military

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

In Israel, almost all non-Arab Israeli citizens over 18 are conscripted into the army. Typically, men serve for three years and women for two.

There are also many young Jews from the Diaspora who go to Israel for the express purpose of joining the army. These volunteers are known as hayalim bodeim, the Lone Soldiers.

Joel Chasnoff, a standup comedian in New York City, is one such Lone Soldier. At 24, the Ivy League graduate left his home and made aliyah. He joined the Israeli army, and though he wanted to become a paratrooper, he was inducted into the 188th Armoured Brigade.

The 188th Crybaby Brigade: A Skinny Jewish Kid from Chicago Fights Hezbollah (Simon and Schuster) is Chasnoff's wry, at times irreverent, account of his stint in an Israeli armoured brigade.

Written with lots of sophomoric humour, as well as serious insightful commentary, The 188th Crybaby Brigade is half MASH, half Full Metal Jacket and takes us through Chasnoff's basic and advanced training and his stint in a patrol unit in Lebanon.

One of the main reasons Chasnoff decided to leave everything and serve in the Israeli army was his belief that as a Jew he had to do his bit for the State of Israel.

Chasnoff had an Israeli girlfriend, Dorit, and since he believed one day he'd get married and live in Israel, he felt that if he didn't do his stint in the army, as Israelis did, he would feel like a freeloader.

Ironically, back home in America, everyone encouraged him to go to Israel and join the army. In Israel, everyone he met thought he was crazy.

But a few weeks into basic training, as he's on leave and strolling through a market with a rifle slung around his shoulders, he takes great pride that he doesn't have to feel guilty about taking without giving back; that he's earned the right to call Israel home.

As with MASH and other army movies, Chasnoff pokes fun and highlights the inane absurdities of army life, such as learning to put up a tent in the dark or being offered combat rations with chocolate spread in tin cans stamped "Kosher For Passover 1985."

One time in Lebanon, Chasnoff's tank fired three rounds and ordered an artillery strike against a poor hapless dog they mistook for a Hezbollah guerrilla.

Chasnoff has a witty, sarcastic bent. He sees the army as an alternate universe ruled by aliens who tell him to do one thing, make him do another, and yell at him for doing that and not the first thing.

But, like MASH, The 188th Crybaby Brigade has a serious side to it. As a 24-year-old in a world populated with 18-year-olds, and as an American, Chasnoff can never fit in. Yet as an outsider, Chasnoff is in a unique position to offer interesting commentary on the state of the Israeli army.

He is bewildered, for instance, that he, a skinny American kid, is one of the best soldiers in the platoon. He is disturbed that inductees can wave medical-excuse permits to shirk long hikes and physical activities, as if this was grade school physical education.

He can't believe that there is a 10/4 snack rule in place. Twice a day, every day, the recruits stop whatever they are doing, sit in a circle and eat snacks as though they are in kindergarten.

What happened to the army he idolized as a kid, he wonders? "If a skinny, lactose-intolerant Jew from the suburbs is the strongest soldier in your platoon, how safe can Israel be?"

The 188th Crybaby Brigade provides an interesting take on basic training in the Israeli army. It offers serious, thoughtful and insightful commentary mixed with juvenile and sexual humour and the colourful sort of language only Israeli soldiers can dream up.

Lone Soldiers by Herb Keinon (Devora Publishing) is a more serious look at the unique plight of the Lone Soldier.

Keinon interviews 14 of these soldiers from the Diaspora and tells us their stories. Who are they? What brought them to Israel? What motivates them?

Yaniv trains in couner-terrorism combat.

They are a huge mix from all over the world, including the United States, Russia, the Dominican Republic and Ethiopia. Four of the 14 are women.

Yaniv, a former police officer and martial arts instructor from Toronto, is a unique case among unique individuals.

We are not entirely sure what he does. His last name is classified because he works in a special counter-terrorist unit. At 31, Yaniv is almost older than everyone else in his unit. His fellow soldiers call him Grandpa. He stands out physically as well. He is more than six feet tall and rippled with muscles. He trains instructors and soldiers involved in anti-terrorist combat martial arts, particularly the Israeli mix called Krav Maga.

He talks about what it was like growing up as an immigrant in Toronto at a young age. He moved to Canada from Israel after spending some time in France. His father also did security work, which Yaniv cannot talk about.

Although he spent some time in Israel in his 20s and even did some basic training, he decided to return to Israel and commit to a minimum of two years in the army during the Second Lebanon War.

It is estimated that about 35 per cent of Lone Soldiers are female and one-third are religious, and 60 per cent serve in combat units. At least five were killed in the Second Lebanon War in 2006.

With a foreward by Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak, this 160-page, fully illustrated glossy book provides an interesting and informative look at the motivations behind the phenomenon of the Lone Soldier.

Canadian leads Israeli team to kidney disease finding

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

HAIFA — Prof. Karl Skorecki, a Canadian who made aliyah in 1995, has just led a research team to a significant genetic finding in the field of non-diabetic kidney disease.

Skorecki is a researcher at the Technion - Israel Institute of Technology and the Rambam Medical Center in Haifa. His team includes researchers from Hadassah Medical Center in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv University and the National Institute of Health (NIH) in Washington, D.C.

Kidney disease affects some 40 million people in North America, half a million of whom suffer from final or end-stage kidney disease requiring life-sustaining dialysis or transplantation.

"This is a significant finding," said Skorecki, a 56-year-old Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) graduate who made aliyah with his wife and five children in 1995 after spending a sabbatical at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot in 1991.

Until recently, it was thought that only certain rare types of kidney disease were genetic in origin. The new finding suggests that genetic factors play an important role, appearing in almost all forms of kidney disease, with one of the highest ever reported genetically-based set of risk markers for a common disease.

In September 2008, scientists at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, Md., designated the importance of gene MYH9, on chromosome 22, as an important genetic marker for kidney disease in African-Americans. Skorecki's team took this research one step further and narrowed it down to one particular even more predictive "risk allele," or any of the forms in which a gene for a specific trait can occur.

The finding, which was published in the current issue of Human Molecular Genetics, goes a long way to explaining why African-Americans have a four-fold higher rate and Hispanic Americans a two-fold higher rate of end-stage kidney disease than Americans of European ancestry.

Skorecki was, however, careful to explain that simply possessing the risk allele does not mean an individual will get kidney disease. "The risk allele heightens the susceptibility of an individual, and although in this case that is very powerful – increasing susceptibility by three to 10-fold – it is not Mendelian. In other words, if your dad has it, it is not certain that you will definitely get it, too," he said. "Most people who have the risk allele will not get kidney disease."

More often than not, those who do get the disease get it as a secondary condition, as the result of a primary factor such as HIV-AIDS, taking certain drugs, or even consuming a high-salt diet.

For example, the finding explains why African-Americans with AIDS frequently get HIVKN, HIV-related kidney nephropathy, while people of European ancestry hardly ever get the condition.

Skorecki also said that although the risk allele is most prevalent among African and Hispanic Americans, it could be present in anyone with African ancestry, though the frequency is much higher in west and south Africa that in north and east.

Interestingly, Ethiopians seem to be protected from the risk allele, a fact that may hold the secret that connects the function of the gene with healthy kidneys. Skorecki and his team are currently working with Ethiopian test cases in Israel, in collaboration with researchers in Ethiopia.

Karl Skorecki

'Research does depend on money and equipment. But more so, it depends on human interactions with excellent students and very strong colleagues and there is no shortage of that in Israel'

In addition to determining susceptibility, the discovery of the risk variant of the gene makes it relatively easy and cheap to screen at-risk populations, a key measure for the prevention of kidney disease. This could especially prove important in regions of the world where dialysis and transplantation are not available and end-stage kidney disease is fatal.

Skorecki's group will meet with U.S. public health officials in April at the NIH to determine who to screen, what the implications are for transplantation, and other immediate public health questions. "It's the fastest I have ever seen a finding turn into public health policy," Skorecki said. "It's very gratifying to see that the work one does gets an immediate response in terms of public health."

In addition to dealing with public heath questions and studying the Ethiopian case, Skorecki and his team are continuing to bring the research to the next plateau. Although they have discovered the risk allele and know how to detect its presence, no group has yet succeeded to find the "causative mutation," the way in which this allele distorts the function of the kidney's filtering cells. "That's the holy grail that everyone is competing for," he says.

Skorecki and his team are taking several paths to get there: studying the evolutionary history of the risk allele and conducting experimentation on the molecular level.

The hope is that this work will ultimately lead to the development of a drug or recognition of an existing drug that might serve as a preventative or therapeutic solution for kidney disease. "The finding has shed light on the basic physiology of the kidney, and this is a necessary precursor for the design of potential treatment," Skorecki said.

He has worked on many medical research projects since he arrived in Israel 15 years ago, not all of them related to kidney disease and genetics. He has also participated in cancer and stem cell research.

"I am extremely impressed with the high level of research taking place in Israel. The country has so many other problems and lacks the economic infrastructure of countries like Canada, the U.S., and the countries of Europe, yet the productivity of our research in Israel has certainly been as good or better than [the research I did] before we moved to Israel," Skorecki said.

"Research does depend on money and equipment. But more so, it depends on human interactions with excellent students and very strong colleagues and there is no shortage of that in Israel."

He also said that the country has a fluid scientific culture that encourages the free exchange of ideas; special study populations, including Druze and Ashkenazi Jews (though that's not relevant to his current research), and ahead-of-the-curve legislation on stem cell research.

Even before he became a scientist, he had a great appreciation for the country. "I have always loved Israel – since CHAT," Skorecki said.

Jewish, Arab kids team up in doubles competition

Compiled by CJN Staff

• JAFFA, Israel — Ninety Jewish and Arab players from across the country teamed up recently for the Jaffa Doubles Coexistence Winter Regional Tournament, a program of the Israel Tennis Center (ITC).

Players from three ITC facilities participated in the event, the fourth in a series of uniquely structured competitions designed to advance positive relations between Jewish and Arab children in Israel using mixed tennis doubles as a vehicle.

"We have been preparing for almost two months for this tournament. Most kids don't get to play doubles that often, but in the Doubles Coexistence teams, we spend lots of time playing doubles and working on doubles tactics, communication and positive reinforcement. I hope today it pays out," said Yaniv Skira, manager of ITC Be'er Sheva. The Be'er Sheva team was joined by players from Jerusalem and host Jaffa.

All matches were played in mixed Jewish-Arab doubles, in four different categories, from mini-tennis with soft balls to full-court games, based on participants' tennis level. With almost 100 matches played in total, teams accumulated points for each match they won.

"Communication is a key element in doubles tennis, but here it is even more significant because of the cultural and linguistic barriers with which the players must cope," said Shachar Yanai, director of the ITC Doubles Coexistence Program.

Tennis brings children together.

Conducting team competitions is an essential component of the ITC's way of building and enhancing co-operation and trust between Arab and Jewish participants. The common interest they share as a team is intended to create positive feelings that will be mirrored in Israeli society at large.

The Jerusalem team dominated the mini-tennis competitions. Ilan Maman, manager of ITC Jerusalem, said, "We brought a busload of players and their parents, and the way it looks at the moment, we are going to be singing songs of victory in Hebrew and Arabic all the way back to Jerusalem."

The players' parents also teamed up to cheer their kids as the competition reached its final stages.

Yoav, a parent from Jaffa, said: "It's an intense experience for these kids. The team aspect puts a lot of responsibility and pressure on them, but you know that, win or lose, just seeing them – Jews and Arabs – playing in the same team, cheering each other or crying together after a tough loss gives me so much hope."

The trophy-award ceremony was the highlight of the event, with each team shouting its lungs out trying to score extra points for morale.

Jerusalem won the mini-tennis category, while the three-quarter court and full court beginners level award went to Jaffa and the full-court advanced level trophy to Be'er Sheva.

In the overall count of points, the hosts from Jaffa came out on top.

"It was a very close competition, and I am really happy we won," said Rakefet Benyamini, manager of ITC Jaffa. "I told the kids before the tournament that every point counts, and even if they lose one or two matches, they shouldn't be discouraged, [because] this is not a regular tennis competition where once you lose you are out and because they are part of a team and they can still win the overall competition."

Gold, silver for Olympic athletes

JTA

VANCOUVER — Two Jewish athletes took home medals at the 2010 Winter Olympic Games in Vancouver.

Steve Meisler won a gold medal for the United States in the four-man bobsled, pushing his team to a combined time of 3:24:46 in the four-heat race.

Ice dancer Charlie White claimed a silver medal along with partner Meryl Davis.

White's victory edged a fellow ice dancer and American Jew, Ben Agosto, off the medal podium. Agosto and his partner, Tanith Belbin, finished fourth. The pair won a silver medal at the 2006 Games.

Other Jewish competitors in ice dancing, the Israeli brother-sister duo Roman and Alexandra Zaretsky, finished 10th. Their routines included music from Schindler's List and Hava Nagila, and in one performance, Roman wore a yarmulke.

Israel's third Olympic athlete, skier Mikail Renzhin, finished 35th in the slalom and 55th in the giant slalom.

Laura Spector, a Jewish biathlete from Massachusetts, finished 65th and 77th in two races.

I'm back in the game

"We've brought the pictures!" my son cries happily as he hands me an envelope filled with photographs.

I'm excited. It's been awhile since our pictures have been taken. I remember my husband, Meir, photographing me a year ago, at my theatre debut (there are no small actors, only small parts!). After that, for some reason, the camera was broken, I think by me. Not sure.

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

Anyway, I open the envelope, and sigh: my lovely family. Here my two kids are stamping on ants, here they're fighting to death at a party, and here they're hugging a smiling chubby lady. There's that chubby cow again, holding my husband passionately… posing her double chin… Hold on, who's that fat cow?

Meir holds me as I sob. "You're not that fat." He tries again. "Really, only on the hips, the belly and the arms, that's it."

I wanna make it clear: I've always been the hot chick, the one all guys drool over, to my husband's displeasure. The one dressed in a provocative way, the one other girls hated. I want girls to hate me again!

"Forty, maybe 50 pounds you've gained, since we came to Canada," Meir comforts me (do I detect a note of contentment?)

The next day, I enter a Weight Watchers class. Eight slim models enter the room, along with three regular women, and two fatties – one of them is me, the other is the lecturer. I drink coffee and look hatefully at the models. The lecturer offers some awful recipes, but at recess, I convince the ladies that adding mayo, yellow cheese and fried onions would make them edible.

I stay with the class for a month and then quit. Meir, as usual, yells at me for wasting his money (I paid a year in advance), but showing him in black on white (the dark denim on my whitish belly) that I'm only gaining weight silences him.

Next, I try a mysterious and a quite scary group, which treats me like a hopeless drug user. The only nice part is that when I admit to being a compulsive eater, liar, murderer, etc., they, in ecstasy, cheer, and you know how much I adore homage. Anyway, there's this cute hotdog stand next door, and when Meir caught me running toward it, in a gruff shout, he forbade me to return.

On TV, I see some old, wrinkled, synthetic-looking ladies dancing as if they're in the middle of a panic attack. You can also see their young and sexy "before" pictures. A blond delivery guy brings them brownies and yummy stuff to eat, so I sign up for the weight-loss plan.

First, there's no truth in advertising. My delivery guy is not blond at all (there aren't many blonds in China). Second, again, I gain weight. Nobody knows why. "Sue them!" advises my son. God bless him, he's gonna be a lawyer. "Strange," says Meir.

Not really. I eat what they deliver, up to 12 p.m., and then I turn to the food in my homely kitchen.

So I start a new trend. Even though I'm getting fatter, I spread the news about my getting thinner. I declare at every opportunity that I'm losing weight, and that I'm starving. Believe it or not, the other night at the movies, when I was in a rush, and standing in that long lineup for popcorn, I even sensed some girls hating me again! I'm back in the game, baby, back in the game!

Exercise helps reduce high blood pressure

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Cardiovascular disease – we have all heard of it, we know the leading causes of it and how to prevent it, yet it is still the No. 1 reason for hospitalization in Canada. A recent study found that 1.29 million Canadians were diagnosed with heart disease in 2005, an increase of 20 per cent over the previous 10 years.

One of the leading causes of cardiovascular disease is hypertension. Hypertension or high blood pressure is diagnosed when the blood flows through your arteries at a higher pressure than normal. The force of the pressure causes scarring, which promotes the buildup of fatty plaque, narrowing your arteries and straining your heart. Left untreated, hypertension can weaken the heart and damage the blood vessels, possibly leading to a stroke, heart attack, chronic renal failure or even death.

Today hypertension is easily controllable with proper diet, regular exercise and medication. The Heart and Stroke Foundation estimates that five million Canadians – 22 per cent of the population – have high blood pressure, an increase of 77 per cent since 1994. But only 16 per cent are actively being treated for it.

A study published in the Archives of Internal Medicine in January 2010 found that moderate resistance exercise three times a week for at least 45 minutes and a diet rich in fruits and vegetables as well as healthy, low-fat fibres can reduce blood pressure by 16.1/9.9 mmHg in as little as four months.

Decreasing your blood pressure by just 2 mmHg reduces your risk of a heart attack by six per cent and of a stroke by 15 per cent. Daily aerobic activity at moderate intensity for 30 to 45 minutes will start to lower your blood pressure in as little as two weeks.

Making healthy life choices like limiting your alcohol and salt intake, regular moderate exercise and having a BMI (body mass index) of 25 or less reduces your risk of a heart attack by 55 per cent.

With risk factors such as obesity, diabetes and hypertension rising among Canadians due to physical inactivity, 48 per cent of us still choose to remain inactive. Want to learn more? Visit me at www.felycesfitness.ca

Spanking children

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I met a fellow who works at a local pet store. He told me, when he was a little boy, his father explained to him that fish will grow according to the size of the aquarium they live in. That night the little boy took his dad's angelfish out of their small aquarium and put them in the bath thinking, "This should make them grow really big."

URBAN WRITER

The fish kid's dad spanked him for his action, which he described as leaving "his ass pretty red."

Home-run-hitting king Mark McGwire and his brother do not talk. According to a recent book written by his brother, they do not communicate, because in 2002, his brother's son, Jay, tickled Mark, which caused him to spill coffee on himself. The hulking baseball giant subsequently turned around and spanked his nephew.

Why are these grown men hitting children?

The fish kid was presented with a formula by the man whom he trusted. He then did what children do. He experimented – not a bad idea at all, and quite creative. He put the fish in a larger body of water. His father then turned around and showed him how wrong it was to listen to him and made sure his boy was afraid of him. "Don't be curious," he essentially said, "and feel unsafe when I'm around."

Mark McGwire showed his nephew how unsafe it was to express himself affectionately and cutely toward him and showed him: "When you do, I will hit you." Would McGwire responded similarly if an adult had done the same?

Children are easy targets for anger. They are small and simple to bully. Do spankers truly believe that hitting children is for the best of that youngster? Is humiliating a little person in their interest – is it a positive way of teaching them lessons in life – or is spanking really an expression of the adult being unable to control his/her anger?

It is clear that many people subscribe to the belief that spanking teaches children life lessons. It is, in fact, an age-old tool used for child rearing and is condoned, and encouraged, in many environments. A very rational and sensible friend told me he has spanked his children, however very infrequently and never when he was angry. He explained there have been times when he felt the only way his child would finally learn something inordinately important – such as stopping at a red light – was if he was spanked.

He said that was not the first course of action, but it was the last and was never administered aggressively or in public. He added, "It could save his life."

Studies show that spanking and corporal punishment delay exploratory skills later on in life. There is also evidence that corporal punishment can create a bullying child, and that later on in life, aggressive behaviour is insignificant to him/her.

While I recognize that parents are forever tired and at times reasoning, logic and explanations are out of the realm of possibility, I fail to see the advantage of physically hitting or spanking a child.

While some parents ideologically believe spanking is the right thing to do and administer it sparingly, it seems that most hit their children out of anger and regret it later on. I can understand why, as being hit by a parent is humiliating. It is embarrassing and weakening for all involved.

The fish kid's ass hurts to this day, not physically but in his head. He never put an angelfish in the bath again, and he grew up scared of his dad. How good is that?

Knesset conversion bill worries Diaspora Jewry

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Diaspora Jews are calling on the government of Israel to kill a bill they say would strengthen haredi Judaism at the expense of other Judaic streams and widen the gap between them and Israelis.

The bill now before the Knesset law committee has also come under fire from Natan Sharansky, head of the Jewish Agency for Israel, and from the Jewish Federations of North America, which called it "an affront to world Jewry."

Conservative and Reform Jews in Canada are writing to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu asking him to intervene to make sure the bill as it now stands does not pass.

At the heart of their concerns is a provision that would amend Israel's Law of Return by preventing converts to Judaism from automatically gaining citizenship if they had ever entered Israel prior to their conversion. Concerns have also been raised that the bill gives the Chief Rabbinate virtual veto power over Israeli conversions – power it does not have today.

Natan Sharansky

The legislation in question was tabled by Yisrael Beitenu (Israel is our Home) MK David Rotem to fulfil a campaign promise to ease the conversion of tens of thousands of immigrants, mostly Russian, who are not halachically Jewish. The bill he advanced proposed permitting local city rabbis to perform conversions. During parliamentary negotiations, two provisions were added that have caused consternation among Diaspora Jews. The first gives the Chief Rabbinate power to annul conversions. The second affects the Law of Return. Reports suggest the latter provision was inserted to prevent temporary workers and even terrorists from converting and claiming citizenship.

In a letter to Miriam Ziv, Israel's ambassador to Canada, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl states: "This legislation will have the effect of providing for a path to alter the Law of Return or, at the least, cause undue hardship to anyone in Israel who has come from the Diaspora communities and seeks conversion in Israel."

The bill will set back efforts "to create greater accessibility to conversion courts in Israel" while adversely impacting the work of the Masorti [Conservative] movement in Israel, said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation, the largest Conservative synagogue in Canada.

ARZA Canada, which represents Reform Jews, called on its members to write to Netanyahu requesting "your immediate intervention to prevent passage of the legislation," which if adopted, would "have the effect of altering the Law of Return, or at the least, cause undue hardship to anyone in Israel who has come from Diaspora communities and seeks conversion in Israel."

Rabbi Michael Stroh, a spokesperson for ARZA Canada, said "the basis of our concern is the further limitation of the ability of people who want to become Jewish to convert to Judaism, even under Orthodox auspices." (City rabbis in Israel are appointed by the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate.)

While the provision permitting local conversions "might be massageable," the other components of the bill "are horrendous," he said.

The News in Brief

Canada

Actor Haim Dies

LOS ANGELES — Toronto-born Jewish actor Corey Haim died last week in Los Angeles of what police called an accidental drug overdose. He was 38. Haim, who admitted to past drug addiction, was best known for his teen roles in the 1980s films Lucas and The Lost Boys. Starting in 2007, he starred for two seasons on the A&E reality show The Two Coreys with fellow former teen star Corey Feldman.

Play Posters Removed

KINGSTON, Ont. — The directors of a student theatre group at Queen's University have apologized for a poster with Nazi colours and a Star of David in place of a swastika that was used to advertise a production of Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice. In an e-mail to the Queen's Journal newspaper, the artistic directors of Vagabond Theatre, Nathaniel Fried, who is Jewish, and Ryan LaPlante, said that "in acknowledgment of the unintended response... we have withdrawn the images" and taken down the posters, the Toronto Star reported. Fried told the Journal he meant no offence, but wanted to use the production, which opened March 11, to compare anti-Semitism in Shakespeare's time to its 20th-century manifestations. Hillel and other campus Jewish groups had complained to Vagabond about the posters.

World

Head Full Of Hebrew

ORLANDO — One of the top defenders in the NBA had the word "defence" inscribed in his hair in Hebrew, as well as in Japanese and Hindi. Ron Artest, a forward for the Los Angeles Lakers, dyed his hair blond and had the word haganah shaved and dyed in purple in his hair to match the team's colours for a March 7 game against the Orlando Magic in Florida. There was no word on whether Artest's Jewish teammate, Jordan Farmar, offered any input into the decision.

Lox Ban 'A Lie'

NEW YORK — The organization that reportedly banned lox as unkosher says the media fabricated the story. "They made it up," Yisroel Neiman, a member of Chevra Mehadrin, told LoHud.com. "It's a lie. We never said lox wasn't kosher." The Monsey, N.Y.-based group of haredi rabbis made news last week when it reportedly declared smoked salmon unkosher because of the presence of a parasitic worm. The fishy story was picked up by a number of news outlets, even though the Orthodox Union declared the ban unjustified.

Ralliers Slur General

NEW YORK — Hundreds of protesters marched in front of a New York City hotel where Israel's military chief of staff was speaking at a dinner. Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi called on the international community to stop Iran's nuclear program in his address March 9 at the Waldorf-Astoria. The dinner was hosted by the Friends of the Israel Defence Forces. Outside, some 500 protesters carried signs reading "From the River to the Sea, Palestine Will Be Free," "Israel Is a Terrorist State," "No More U.S. Tax Dollars for Israel" and "Nuremberg Justice For Israeli War Criminals." Some 25 U.S., Jewish and Israeli groups took part. About 100 pro-Israel demonstrators gathered across the street.

Disgraced Native Leader Dies of Cancer

SASKATOON — David Ahenakew, the former national native leader who once called Jews "a disease," died March 12 after a long battle with cancer. He was 76.

David Ahenakew

Ahenakew, former head of the Assembly of First Nations, was charged after a speech and subsequent interview with a reporter in 2002 in which he called Jews a "disease... that's going to take over."

He added: "The Jews damn near owned all of Germany prior to the war. That's how Hitler came in. He was going to make damn sure that the Jews didn't take over Germany or Europe." He was found guilty in 2005 of wilfully promoting hatred and fined $1,000. The conviction was overturned on appeal, and he was acquitted in February 2009 after a second trial, on the grounds he didn't set out to promote hatred against Jews.

Ahenakew, who died in hospital in Shellbrook, Sask., found out he had cancer shortly before his second trial began in November 2008, his lawyer, Doug Christie, told the Saskatoon StarPhoenix.

He was stripped of his Order of Canada, and at his retrial, he repeated his view that Jews caused World War II.

IAW fizzles on Canadian campuses

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) turned into Israel appreciation week this year, said Brandon Crandall of Hillel at York.

According to several Jewish groups, IAW, which ran from March 1 to 14 on campuses in 13 Canadian cities, was much milder this year, with fewer anti-Semitic incidents and smaller crowds.

"[At York], it was quite lame, to be honest. [IAW] events were generating about 20 students at most events," said Crandall, who is also a Hillel of Greater Toronto intern. "In previous years, IAW was very heated. A rally usually took place. There were assaults. [There was] intimidation that occurred for the past several years, except this year."

The atmosphere on campus was much more peaceful, Crandall said, adding that pro-Israel events at York generated large crowds of up to 100 students.

An IAW spokesperson said IAW events were well attended.

According to Crandall, IAW may have been calmer this year because of national condemnation of the event, which included statements from Liberal and Conservative politicians, and from James Pasternak, school board trustee for York Centre, who asked the Toronto District School Board to denounce IAW.

"I hope it means that… IAW keeps going downhill until it no longer exists. Really, I hope it means positive things for the Jewish community, because the past few years have been unbearable," he said.

Keith Marnoch, York's associate director of media relations, said there were no major incidents at York this year.

Robert Steiner, assistant vice-president in charge of strategic communications at the University of Toronto, said the same thing about his school.

"It was very low key this year [at U of T]," Steiner said. "I didn't hear of any complaints from anyone about any incidents."

Beca Bookman, a member of U of T's Hillel and a first-year student, was surprised at the atmosphere on campus.

"It was a lot better than I would have expected. It was very quiet for the most part. We had a really good response [to pro-Israel events] and hopefully that aided the student body to understand what's actually going on in Israel," she said.

Beca Bookman

Similar reports came from schools across the country, said Rebecca Cherniak, chair of Israel affairs and advocacy for the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students, which helped to organize cross-Canada, pro-Israel education initiatives on various campuses ahead of IAW.

"IAW has been minimal across Canada [this year]. It's been tame. Many of the presentations have been scheduled in rooms that are not in the centre of campus," she said, adding that IAW events weren't well attended.

Cherniak said this change was due, in part, to better organization and planning of pro-Israel campaigns, such as the Truth Campaign and Size Doesn't Matter, a national initiative that helped raise awareness about Israel through a website and a speaker series.

"Last year, there was no centralized organization of how we would... pre-empt [IAW]. Some schools had some success of doing Israel week [last year], but because we were able to have, for the first year, a national strategy… students felt empowered that they were being supported nationally," said Cherniak, who is also president of Israel on Campus at McMaster University.

"I think it's a shift. In past years, we were so ready to react and respond [to IAW activities]. In future years, we know that we can set… our own terms. That was what was so successful about this year," she said.

A saga of Galilee in the 1880s

From the editor's desk...

History becomes saga, narrative becomes epic and the fate of individuals a tightly felt sighing breath of hope and reward in the gripping book by Shulamit Lapid, Valley of Strength (The Toby Press).

Lapid lovingly, deftly, painstakingly, with great attention to detail, tells the story of 16-year-old Fania, who arrives in the port of Jaffa in the late 1800s, caring for an infant daughter and a mentally ill brother.

Fania has survived a pogrom in her eastern European hometown of Elizavetgrad. She has not, however, left it behind. She is constantly tortured by the memory of the slaughter of her family and of the horrible physical abuse she herself suffered at the hands of the drunken, anti-Semitic murderers.

The story begins in Jaffa with Fania undergoing a form of marriage with a widower, Yehiel Silas, also young, but still 10 years older than his newly chosen bride. Fania agrees to be Yehiel's wife and mother to his two children. He agrees to provide a home and shelter to the young girl-woman-mother and her two charges. Together they head east and north to a small pioneering community in the Galilee called Gai Oni, (Hebrew for valley of strength). The small community is adjacent to an Arab village of similar name Jaoini.

Yehiel is one of the struggling community's original founders. Their numbers are severely depleted, however, due to the sheer hardship and overwhelming difficulty of bringing forth any food, let alone bread, from the rocky, drought-stricken land.

Gai Oni eventually becomes the village of Rosh Pina, the first settlement in the Galilee. (Rosh Pina is a reference to the phrase in Psalm 118:22. In this context it translates as cornerstone. It is, presumably, as the cornerstone of the return of Jewish settlement to the Galilee, that the settlers in the 19th century chose the name for their newly founded community.)

Lapid tells us the story of the excruciatingly difficult, though not unrewarding, life led by the founders of the village. It is also, of course, the heartbreaking, inspiring story of the history of the first modern returners to the Land of Zion.

Fania is the focal point.

Strong-willed, determined, educated, refined, courageous, unyielding, vulnerable, needy, hard as rock or soft as a cooing dove: she is all of these things. A feminist long before the term had any meaning in our modern lexicon, Fania refuses to surrender to the omnipresent "larger forces" that affect the toll and toil of their daily lives. Whether those forces are the unyielding terrain; the corrupt Ottoman authorities and their cloying footmen; marauding Bedouins; the well-meaning, overseas Jewish philanthropists who made possible the purchase of the land; the climate; the malaria-spreading mosquitoes; the religious, social and other intolerance of fellow Jews; or the dark shadows of her past occasionally casting their ugly darkness over her life with Yehiel, Fania stands astride them all.

VALLEY OF STRENGTH
SHULAMIT LAPID

Her individuality, strength of character and femininity suffuse the story, intended perhaps by Lapid as a metaphor for the land itself: fruitful but scarred, generous but wounded, harsh yet yielding.

Lapid is a celebrated author in Israel. She has won numerous awards at home and abroad for her impressive and diverse body of work. Valley of Strength richly exemplarizes why her work has been set aside for such praise.

Lapid powerfully evokes the sense of place that was not only the struggling, infant village on the rock-cragged landscape of the Galilee in the 1880s but also the newly forming society of idealists, pragmatists, farmers and businessmen, young and old, pious and impious, men and women then taking shape in the Land of Israel.

But Lapid's depiction of place is not restricted to the domain of the physical, to geography and topography. Rather, Lapid also depicts the equally difficult terrain of the characters' psyches and emotions.

Valley of Strength tells a macro story of the wretchedly hard and forlorn days that accompanied the first modern efforts at redeeming the land. But it also tells a micro story of love and tenderness, sacrifice and missed moments. Lapid obviously intends the title to refer to more than the name of the tiny settlement that was founded on land bought by Jews for Jews and worked by Jews to its ultimate flowering. The book's name refers as well to the nature of the human spirit and character that were necessary to make that happen.

Valley of Strength (Gai Oni in its original Hebrew title), first published in 1982, is regarded as a master work of the modern Israeli canon of literature.

The Toby Press has made it accessible to English-language readers through the excellent translation of Philip Simpson, as part of Toby's ongoing mission of bringing highlight works of classical and modern Hebrew literature to a broader readership. We, the readers, are the great beneficiaries.

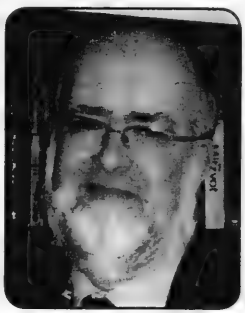
Draft report released on Jewish education

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is reviewing a draft report about the future of the former Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education that recommends increasing the level of professionalism in Jewish education, its author says.

Paul Shaviv, director of education at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and director of the federation transition committee working on the issue, wrote the detailed 42-page draft report, which was released early in the new year and includes more than 60 recommendations.



Paul Shaviv

Federation spokesperson Howard English told The CJN that "a wide variety of stakeholders" including school administrators, lay leaders, rabbis, representatives of parents' associations and agencies that work with schools, such as JVS, JF&CS and JIAS, are being consulted. A final version is expected to be ready in June.

Last year, the centre – which was known as the Mercaz, and, before a 2007 restructuring, as the Board of Jewish Education – underwent a major downsizing that eliminated 10 of its 14 full-time jobs. As well, its budget was cut from $13.8 million to $12.6 million. At the same time, tuition subsidies were increased by $500,000.

Shaviv said the report has three major thrusts: governance, professional development, and school accreditation.

Its recommendations focus on six areas: governance structure and budget; school improvement and professional and lay-leadership development; school accreditation; easing entry-level access to the Jewish school system; community outreach and inclusion; and the "essential services blanket," which includes professional development grants and city-wide inter-school activities.

A section on tuition assistance recommends that tuition subsidies be administered by a central community office, rather than individual schools. One reason is to be able to assess families with children at more than one school, the report states. As well, it urges having an independent ombudsman to resolve disagreements about tuition assessments.

The same section also suggests that teachers' children receive a tuition break, as they do in most other communities.

Funding of Jewish schools must continue to be given top preference, the report advises. A footnote states that such funding constitutes "the largest domestic allocation of UJA Federation – and by far the most generous funding given to Jewish education by any North American federation. Yet the funding amounts to not more than 10 per cent of the annual budget of most individual schools."

The report also recommended a new name for the federation department: the UJA Federation Centre for Jewish Education (CJE).

The report explains that the term "board" in the centre's former name led many people to believe that the entity was "the equivalent of the [Toronto District School Board] or the Catholic School Board, and could overrule individual schools on all sorts of issues."

While the centre can only exercise limited authority over the schools, according to the report, it "can justifiably expect fulfilment of defined criteria from recipients of funding."

Among the budget-related suggestions are consideration of grants to educators to attend conferences and courses.

As well, an expanded professional development program should be the entity's "central task," linked to an accreditation process, the report states. "The aim of this should result in every Jewish parent knowing that sending their child into a 'CJE-accredited school' is a guarantee of a top-quality education," the report adds.

The report recommends that community education professionals must be included as part of the centre's decision-making body and must be part of its budgetary, policy and decision-making processes. As well, it notes that previously, school administrators were not consulted about Mercaz services.

English – speaking on behalf of the federation and Craig Rimer, chair of its transition committee – declined to comment on the draft report's recommendations and the response to it so far, aside from crediting Shaviv for his "creative... and interesting ideas," until after the final version is issued.

"The content of the report could change significantly by the time it receives final approval," English said.

It's expected to be presented to the federation board in late April or early May.

Four day school principals contacted by The CJN last week were either not reachable or declined to comment for this story.

Excessive exploitation of inexcusable decision

Last week, just as U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden was settling in to his visit in Israel with his host Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, the Israeli Minister of the Interior, Eli Yishai, announced the decision by the Jerusalem District Planning and Building Committee to approve construction of 1,600 new housing units in Ramat Shlomo in eastern Jerusalem.

The timing of Yishai's announcement was so absolutely horrendous that it could not have been coincidental. Biden was embarrassed. The U.S. administration was furious. It retaliated to this embarrassment of its vice-president with harsh condemnation of Israel. The temperature of bilateral relations between the two countries plunged immediately to a very low, cold level. As of this writing, significant degrees of warmth have not yet been restored.

Yishai should have known that announcing the housing project during Biden's visit in Jerusalem would be an affront to the visiting dignitary and to the government he represented. That he made the announcement, nevertheless, was inexcusable and an indictment of his sorry judgement. It is also an indictment of the archaic electoral system in Israel that confers upon small, single-issue, narrowly based ethnic parties disproportionately significant policy making roles as well as high-handed leverage in forming and wielding a national government.

That there was nothing new in the housing announcement or that it is to take effect in a number of years, does not mitigate Yishai's exceptionally inhospitable, graceless act of publicly embarrassing an invited guest into his home. But precisely because there was nothing new in the Yishai announcement, the increasingly edgier American denunciation of Israel is excessive.

Not satisfied with a public dressing down of the Israeli prime minister by the vice-president, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton also weighed into the fray last Friday to berate Netanyahu further in a telephone conversation, much of the content of which was conveniently leaked to the public. Clinton is reported to have made at least four demands of Netanyahu that include: investigating the process that led to the announcement of the Ramat Shlomo construction plans in the middle of Biden's visit; reversing the decision; making a substantial gesture toward the Palestinians enabling the renewal of peace talks, and issuing an official declaration that talks with the Palestinians will deal with the conflict's core issues.

The U.S. is exploiting the Yishai affront to prove its tough, hard mettle in the Arab world by pressuring Israel. This American offensive against Israel, however, is intemperate and counterproductive.

Bullying Israel does not advance the peace process, nor does giving the Palestinian leaders a free ride, absolving them of the hypocrisy of their ongoing doublespeak about peace. Palestinian leaders last weekend incited violence against Jews in Jerusalem with lies and fabrications about Jewish intentions on the Temple Mount. There was no American rebuke. The contrast in American responses is also an affront.

25 years ago in The CJN

Prime Minister Brian Mulroney promised to seriously consider Israel's request for Canadian troops as peacekeepers in the Sinai, replacing a departing Australian unit in the multinational force. Israeli foreign minister Yitzhak Shamir made the request in a meeting with Mulroney just before the end of Shamir's two-day visit to Ottawa.

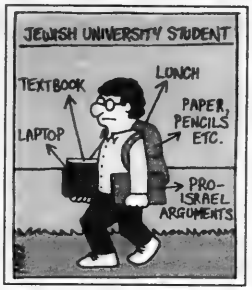
Food bank often teeters on bankruptcy

It is difficult to purchase kosher food when choices in life might come down to keeping kosher or paying the electric bill. Because of those challenges, the Pride of Israel has maintained a communal kosher food bank for the past 15 years. Our volunteers are here every Wednesday morning. They pack kosher food and have kind words for more than 100 people every week.

When we are lucky, the food bank receives donations of both money and food. But despite many individual and community efforts, the food bank at the Pride of Israel often teeters on bankruptcy. In my short tenure at the shul, we have had more than one discussion about what to do in the next week or two when the money and food run out. Somehow, the Pride manages to pull the rabbit out of a hat, though, and we always manage to get through the next week.



The kosher food bank at the Pride of Israel cannot afford to rely on such miracles all the time. I would like to thank all those who have contributed food over the years, and to ask you to continue to step up to the plate. It is not enough to feed someone once. Tomorrow is another day, and our entire community needs to be able to eat.

More specifically, I would like to thank the Ontario-Quebec Rabbinical Assembly for its decision to make an annual commitment to supporting the kosher food bank. It is my hope that the other rabbinical organizations around the city will rise to the standard set by the Rabbinical Assembly.

Apartheid Week basis for lawsuit

I was a student at both University of Toronto and York University some years ago. My heart goes out to all students who have to put up with the disturbance of their normal, peaceful studies during Israeli Apartheid Week. In fact, I am appalled that the university executive would allow such an insidious display of anti-Semitic propaganda to engulf the campus and let's be clear: it is anti-Semitic.

One attribute that Jews may possess in an abundant measure is brains. Surely when an identifiable group of students (i.e. supporters of Israel) pays the same tuition fees as others (i.e. the anti-Semites) and is discriminated against, suffers harm (i.e. disruption to their daily routines and impacting negatively on their peace of mind), there is a basis for a lawsuit. I challenge our many brilliant Jewish lawyers across North America to take on all universities that allow this form of hatred to live and grow. When they realize that they are subject to significant financial liability, this "leopard" will quickly change its spots.

Judaism isn't a buffet religion

Writing about a "post-halachic" Judaism, as Rabbi Dow Marmur does, is like referring to the "brainless" or "heartless" human of the future ("Religious revival," March 4). Without Halachah, Judaism is an empty shell, a non-religion, and those who choose not to abide by it should not be cloaked with some sort of new religious vestment. They are, as they themselves will admit, non-observant Jews.

Rabbi Marmur should know that Judaism is a religion of doing, both in a positive and negative way. That's why Maimonides' greatest work was a restatement of the oral law of Israel. He knew that Judaism was and will be accused of being formalistic and ceremonial, ignoring that its uniqueness lies in conferring spiritual value to everyday, ordinary acts.

In the same vein, and in the same issue of The CJN, Sheldon Kirshner interviews a new convert to Judaism who says that of the 613 commandments, he decided to follow those that made sense to him ("'It feels good to be Jewish,' says convert Benjamin Errett," Toronto edition). Somebody forgot to teach him that Judaism is not a pick-and-choose proposition or a buffet religion, and that those who do it will just practise a Jewish-style religion.

'Morally ambiguous assassinations'

Sheldon Kirshner in his column "Israel's 'Superman'" (March 4) refers to Israel having resorted to "morally ambiguous assassinations." My question to him is as follows: would he have considered as "morally ambiguous" an assassination of Hitler or of his henchmen? A "yes" answer speaks for itself. However, a "no" answer would beg the question: at what level of evil perpetrated against Jews would an assassination become "morally ambiguous"?

Biden reaffirms the 'unbreakable bond'

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

U.S. Vice President Joe Biden's attempt to reassure Israel of American steadfastness survived a steadfast Middle East tradition of self-sabotage.

Biden's intended message in a much ballyhooed speech in Israel on March 11 at Tel Aviv University – that the United States would stand by Israel through thick and thin – was unequivocal. Yet it was clear that he and his speechwriters tweaked the text to encompass references to the Israeli settlement building and Palestinian incitement that almost marred his trip to the region.

Biden started by reaffirming the "unbreakable bond" between Israel and the United States, as he had following his arrival earlier this week. The bond was "impervious to any shifts in either country and in either country's partisan politics," he said to applause.

He added that it was critical for the international community to understand the bond.

"Every time progress is made, it's been made when the rest of the world knows there's no space between the United States and Israel when it comes to Israel's security, none – no space," the vice-president said.

Biden's speech was an opening salvo in rolling back Israeli and Jewish insecurities stoked by President Barack Obama's speech last summer to the Muslim world.

Jewish community leaders in the United States and some Israeli leaders were unsettled by Obama's sharp parallels in that speech between Israeli and Palestinian suffering. And some objected to how Obama emphasized the sequence of the Holocaust and the establishment of Israel. The concerns were exacerbated a few weeks later when Obama met with the Jewish leadership and said he would make public disagreements with Israel.

The White House, which insisted Obama had emphasized the Holocaust to scold the Arab world for allowing its denial to flourish, was frustrated by Jewish unhappiness with a speech that was supposed to have been about outreach to Arabs and Muslims – a point that Biden made in his March 11 remarks.

"We're absolutely convinced this approach will improve not only our security but, as a result, your security," Biden said of outreach to the Muslim world.

Nonetheless, it was clear that Biden took care to hit all the marks that Obama missed in his Cairo speech.

"Incitement against Israel continues, as do the attacks on the legitimacy of Jewish ties to this ancient land," he said, a deliberate nod to Israeli anger that Obama had not referred to the Holy Land's Jewish religious roots in his Cairo address.

Earlier in the speech, Biden recalled his working-class Irish-Catholic dad, "who often spoke passionately about the special connection between the Jewish people and this land."

Stephen P. Cohen, a former Princeton University scholar who is close to the Obama administration and helped draft the Cairo speech, said Biden's speech was not the last word on U.S. closeness to Israel.

"The parallel to the Cairo speech will eventually come from the president himself at the right time," said Cohen, who has just authored Beyond America's Grasp: A Century of Failed Diplomacy in the Middle East.

"There has been a good deal of talk that Obama has put a lot of emphasis on the Holocaust as a predisposing element in the creation of the State of Israel. I think this is an important addition to that thinking," he said, referring to the Biden speech, "a correction to that thinking."

Most pronouncedly, Biden earned applause when he said that Iran must not achieve nuclear weapons capability.

"The United States is determined to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, period," he said. "I know that for Israel, there is no greater existential strategic threat. Trust me, we get that."

Notably, however, Biden only spoke of Iran's isolation and did not include the "all options on the table" euphemism for the possibility of military engagement. Obama and his predecessor, George W. Bush, have used the phrase, and Israel still favours it, most recently in a New York speech by Lt.-Gen. Gaby Ashkenazi, Israel's military chief of staff.

Biden was forced into detours from his prepared remarks by Israel's announcement this week that it had authorized 1,600 housing starts in disputed eastern Jerusalem.

"That decision undermined the trust required for negotiations," he said, and under instructions from Obama, "I condemned it immediately and unequivocally." He added, to applause: "Sometimes only a friend can deliver the hardest truth."

Biden seemed galled, especially that Israel made the announcement while he was meeting with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Salam Fayyad, Palestinian leaders deemed moderate both by Israel and the United States.

"Israeli leaders finally have willing partners who share the goal of peace between two states and have the competence to establish a nation," he said.

"Their commitment to peace is an opportunity that must be seized. It must be seized. Who has there been better to date, to have the prospect of settling this with? But instead, two days ago the Israeli government announced it would advance planning for new housing units in east Jerusalem."

U.S. Vice President Joe Biden and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu speak to each other last week in Jerusalem. Biden kept Netanyahu waiting for 90 minutes before he arrived to dinner.

[Flash90 photo]

Biden accepted Netanyahu's explanation that he also had been blindsided by the announcement by his Interior Ministry. The minister, Eli Yishai, has apologized both for the timing and for not giving Netanyahu a heads up. Speculation was rife on both sides of the Atlantic as to what had happened.

The committee making the announcement is jointly run by the Jerusalem municipality and Yishai's ministry. Both Yishai's haredi Shas Party and the Jerusalem mayor, Nir Barkat, have been known for their attempts to make political inroads into Netanyahu's right flank.

In any case, the gaffe had U.S. officials and some in the pro-Israel community wondering whether Netanyahu was fully in control of his government.

The Palestinian Authority also barely averted a PR disaster: it cancelled a ceremony to honor a woman who led the 1978 hijacking of a bus in which 35 Israelis were killed. A traffic circle in Ramallah was supposed to be named for Dalal Mughrabi and a memorial plaque unveiled March 11. The event was canceled March 10 to avoid antagonizing Biden, according to reports.

Cohen wondered whether such events were instigated by hardliners who thrive on isolation. In Israel, he said, there has been a view among some right-wingers that Jews and Israelis "are too vulnerable to our need to be loved."

Canada criticizes Israel over east Jerusalem housing units

Compiled by CJN Staff

OTTAWA — In a rare rebuke of Israel, Foreign Affair Minister Lawrence Cannon added Canada's voice to that of the United States in criticizing last week's announcement of Israeli plans to build 1,600 new housing units in east Jerusalem.

"The government of Canada regrets the government of Israel's announcement of plans for the construction of further housing units in east Jerusalem," Cannon said in a statement.

"Consistent with the positions of the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and other key partners, the Canadian government sees the construction of permanent settlements in east Jerusalem as an obstacle to the prospects for peace."

He added that "Canada believes that all parties should abide by their international commitments" and that the announcement "does not advance the cause of peace in the region."

Cannon said that Ottawa "welcomes the recent announcement that Israelis and Palestinians intend to start indirect peace talks. Canada has consistently held that the way forward for both parties must be through a negotiated settlement of this decades-old conflict."

Meanwhile, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas last week sought guarantees from Washington that it would pressure Israel to cancel its plan for the new units, Palestinian media reported.

U.S. Mideast envoy George Mitchell spoke with Abbas late last Thursday and urged him not to walk away from indirect peace talks with Israel, a senior Palestinian official quoted in the reports said.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said he believes the indirect talks will continue as planned despite the crisis with the United States over plans for the new housing and protests by the Palestinian Authority and Arab world.

"The crisis is behind us," sources in the prime minister's office said, adding that proof was U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden's invitation to Netanyahu to meet in Washington in 10 days while Netanyahu visits a meeting of the pro-Israel AIPAC lobby group.

Nonetheless, senior U.S. officials said that even though the crisis is over publicly, it will take time to restore trust between the two sides.

The future of talks was raised during a telephone conversation between Biden and Netanyahu on March 11. Biden also discussed the issue with Abbas.

Biden told the Palestinian leader that the United States opposes settlement construction, but is determined to resume talks. He stressed to Abbas that Washington would disapprove of a delay in taking the talks forward.

Another week of lies and libel

The winter ritual that brands Israel as an apartheid state has come and gone for yet another year – and good riddance. To the unwary, it might appear that the rancour that defines this loathed event was more muted than has previously been the case, but we should not be fooled by such perceptions.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

To begin with, it needs to be recognized that in each of its successive appearances since it first polluted just one campus – the University of Toronto in 2005 – "Israeli Apartheid Week" (IAW) has grown both in its reach and also in the sophistication with which it directs its assault on Israel and Jewish peoplehood. Forty-nine campuses – including those in 12 Canadian cities – hosted IAW activities during the first week in March, with spillover into a second week of programming at some centres.

IAW has been variously described as a "platform for racism," a "festival of bigotry," and an "assault on truth." Not only is it all of these, it's much more.

What's so unfortunate, however, is that university administrators, in their fixation with upholding what they regard as fundamental tenets of free speech, have been unable to address the divisiveness, marginalization and intimidation that occur when this hallowed freedom is blatantly abused by those whose only objective is to demonize and delegitimize the State of Israel and its supporters.

Given the lies and libels that generally punctuate IAW presentations, it's inevitable that most who attend cannot help but come away with at least a negative stereotype of Jews and what we stand for. It's of even greater concern that, in many instances, the level of invective gets to be so frenzied and hostile that more emerges than just negative labelling, with bigotry and incitement to hatred as the more likely outcomes.

And while it's commendable that mainstream agencies in our community have at last begun to waken from their stupor and initiate programs to enable Jewish students and faculty to push back against those who can do no better to validate themselves than to invalidate us, their efforts should be seen not as an end in itself, but merely as one among many strategies that still need urgently to be invoked if the campus climate is to improve.

Importantly, we've now heard political leaders at both the federal and provincial levels, as well as trustees of the Toronto District School Board, roundly condemning IAW. Surely now is the time to build on their examples – to consolidate the type of moral suasion that will, once and for all, rid our campuses of the IAW plague.

Hebron heritage designation was a misstep

There's a saying in Hebrew, usually associated with driving, that "it's not enough to be right, you also have to be clever." Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu should have thought of this idiom before capitulating to religious and right-wing politicians by adding the Cave of the Patriarchs, or Machpela, in Hebron, to a list of 150 national heritage sites.

Yair Lapid in Jerusalem

Hebron is a veritable powder keg, constantly on the brink of explosion. Nestled in the Judean Hills, it teems with ancient lanes and biblically significant archeology. Its centrepiece – the Machpela Cave – is the second-most holy site for Jews, after Jerusalem's Temple Mount. Purchased by Abraham himself, it's believed to be the burial site of Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca, Jacob and Leah. This certainly makes it a Jewish heritage site. However, its Abrahamic connection also makes it an important Muslim holy place. The impressive compound, originally built above the cave by Herod 2,000 years ago, houses synagogues and mosques used interchangeably by Jews and Muslims.

Leaders, both military and political, must ensure the lid is kept tightly on the keg that is Hebron. It's been my experience as legal adviser for the Israel Defence Forces in the West Bank that no decision, large or small, concerning Hebron in general, and the Machpela Cave in particular, can be made before it's thoroughly examined to ensure all potential complexities – political, security, humanitarian, religious or legal – are properly analyzed. Only then is the issue brought before the relevant authority to be suitably decided upon.

Not enough thought was given to the last-minute designation of the Machpela Cave as a heritage site, and in the weeks since, its ramifications have reverberated both locally and internationally, with fresh outbursts of violence and vocal condemnations. It might have been meaningful if it were not only declaratory, but the truth is that little will change within the Machpela without at least tacit Israeli-Palestinian co-operation.

Hebron is the West Bank's largest city, with more than 160,000 Palestinian inhabitants. In 1979, Menachem Begin's government formally re-established the city's Jewish presence. It's now home to roughly 1,000 Israelis, mainly concentrated in the historic Jewish Quarter, and it's the only Israeli settlement in the West Bank wholly within the boundaries of a major Palestinian municipality.

Most of the renewed settlement is built on properties owned by Jews before 1948 and presently administered by the IDF's military government. Many of Hebron's erstwhile Jewish residents left after the 1929 massacre, when Arab rioters murdered 67 Jews, injured 60 others and ransacked Jewish homes, businesses and synagogues.

From the outset, the restored Jewish presence in Hebron wasn't welcomed by Palestinians. Jews have been the target of countless attacks, many of them lethal. Settlers have not always been neighbourly, either. Attacks against them have precipitated acts of violence against Palestinians and their property, including in 1994, when Baruch Goldstein, a physician from neighbouring Kiryat Arba, cold-bloodedly gunned down 29 Palestinians praying in the Machpela Cave.

Hebron's state of affairs is subject to unique arrangements between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, which divide it into two areas, known as H-1 and H-2. In rough terms, in H-1, with 130,000 Palestinians and the majority of the city's territory, the Palestinian Authority controls both security and civilian affairs. The Jewish Quarter and its inhabitants and some 30,000 Palestinians reside within H-2. In this area the PA controls civilian affairs for Palestinians, while the IDF is responsible for overall security and civilian affairs relating to Israelis and their property.

Because of Palestinian violence, the IDF has implemented extensive restrictions on Palestinians' freedom of movement within H-2, aimed at protecting Hebron's Jewish residents and the thousands of people who visit it annually. Almost no Palestinian vehicle can travel on H-2 roads, and nearly all Palestinian businesses have been closed. These constraints have made living in the area difficult, and many Palestinians have left, much to the delight of their Jewish neighbours.

Netanyahu's attempt to add the heritage site designation into this already tightly woven fabric will fail. It also suggests an alarming lack of acumen, a predilection many have come to believe he'd overcome during his second term in office.

Was Moses a war criminal?

This year, in reciting the Passover story and Exodus from Egypt, I suggest extending the discussion to include stories that might have been featured in newspapers, blogs, and nightly news broadcasts of 4,000 years ago (give or take a few centuries).

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In this not-so-imaginary world, the headlines and video clips highlight stark images of blood flowing in the Nile and the devastation from frogs, boils, locusts and other plagues. The BBC sends a team of reporters and producers to document the devastation in Egypt for a 10-part series – one for each plague. In Canada, daily editorials in the Toronto Star attack the government for its pro-Israelite ideology, and the CBC Radio team of Carol Off and Barbara Budd hold moving interviews with carefully chosen Egyptian victims, reached in their servant-less Cairo villas.

These media stories are accompanied by United Nations Human Rights Council resolutions condemning the Israelites for brutal violations of international law and the disproportionate use of force. (European, accompanied by some Canadian diplomats, are seen squirming awkwardly in their seats and wagging their fingers at the Israelite delegation.)

In parallel, the leaders of moral non-governmental superpowers and watchdog groups, such as Human Rights Watch (HRW) and Amnesty International, hold press conferences and give sage-sounding interviews to voice their condemnations, while demanding independent investigations and prosecution of Moses. HRW's Middle East division publishes glossy research reports filled with Egyptian eyewitness testimony and characterizing each of the 10 plagues as collective punishment, a war crime on an unprecedented scale. The Richard Goldstone of the time is appointed to head a committee that collects all of these NGO claims into a United Nations report for use in the case against Moses, Aaron and the 70 Israelite leaders.

Nowhere in these reports is there any mention of the almost 400 years of slavery and brutal treatment that preceded the plagues and march to freedom, with little more than hard crackers for food. Instead, in this narrative, the Israelites are presented as foreign occupiers who conspired with Joseph to steal the land of Goshen from the natives. The record of failed negotiations, which could have ended the conflict peacefully, is completely erased, as are Pharoah's trail of broken promises (peace breakthroughs of the time) to let the Israelites go.

On university campuses, NGO activists mark Israelite Apartheid Week (actually two weeks, but who pays attention to such details?). Frogs and red water are brought in to simulate the suffering caused by the plagues, and mock trials are held, which start with the conclusion that Moses is guilty. At York University, speakers at conferences and mass rallies call for a campaign of boycotts, divestment and sanctions to punish and isolate the Israelites.

Then, as now, these condemnations and activities are supported by a small but noisy group of disgruntled Israelites, motivated by an exaggerated sense of self-importance and the belief that a right-wing conspiracy led by Moses is responsible for all of the problems. Through grants provided by the New Israelite Fund, these "independent voices" join the demands that the Israelites return to Egypt immediately, apologize and provide compensation for damages.

And these problems did not end with the parting of the Red Sea, or Sea of Reeds, and the drowning of Pharoah's army (another war crime) in hot pursuit of the runaway slaves.

Later, in the desert, as the Israelites prepared for returning to their homeland in the Land of Israel, first Moses and then, 39 years later, Joshua dispatched groups of spies to prepare for the invasion. The biblical text provides many details of these complex intelligence operations, including the role of double agents, but it doesn't describe the nature of the passports they used, or whether they were disguised. Today, this action would have led to pompous denunciations about the invasion of Jericho's sovereignty, and calls for more investigations.

Thus, as our generation struggles for justice, as did our ancestors, the Passover story and the Exodus remain very relevant. The names and details may change, but the overall situation has a great deal to teach us, 4,000 years later.

The Kirshner File

Israel targeted by boycott campaign

Israeli Apartheid Week, which wrapped up last week, has mutated into an annual anti-Israel rant of demonstrations, lectures and cultural events. Started five years ago by the University of Toronto's Arab Students' Collective as a unique five-day show of solidarity "with the people of Palestine and other oppressed nations," IAW has exploded into a two-week Israel-bashing phenomenon in more than 40 cities around the world.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Pro-Palestinian activists regard IAW as an integral part of the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign, whose stated objectives are to force Israel to abide by international law and the universal principles of human rights. In practical terms, however, BDS' aim is to demonize and delegitimize Israel as a racist, pariah state.

Comparing Israel to apartheid-era South Africa, the global BDS network believes that Israel should be toppled by non-violent means and replaced by a secular, non-denominational model – the goal of the Palestine Liberation Organization before its formal acceptance of a two-state solution.

BDS was formed in 2005 by 171 Palestinian non-governmental organizations to achieve several specific goals: to end Israel's "occupation and colonization of all Arab lands;" to force Israel to dismantle "the wall," or separation barrier; to pressure Israel to recognize the "fundamental rights" of Israeli Arabs so they can attain full civic equality, and to coerce the Israeli government to let Palestinian refugees return to their former homes and properties in what is now Israel.

A BDS anti-Israel graphic

Despite the clarity of its objectives, BDS is a highly decentralized movement with no fixed leadership, its independent chapters working together in a common cause. Although BDS has not explicitly espoused a one-state or two-state solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, and although one of its top strategists, Omar Barghouti, distinguishes between Israel proper and the occupied territories, BDS' support of the Palestinians' "right of return" under United Nations Resolution 194 strongly suggests that it essentially denies Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state underpinned by Zionist principles.

Let's be clear.

If millions or even hundreds of thousands of Palestinian refugees were to be resettled in Haifa, Jaffa, Ashdod, Ashkelon and Be'er Sheva, Israel would eventually be transformed into a Muslim Arab state by virtue of demography.

Or as the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat once put it in a supreme moment of clarity, the Palestinians, given their much higher birthrate, would ultimately win the battle of the loins, consigning Israel as we know it today to the dustbin of history.

BDS was established by Palestinian Arabs, but most of its supporters and sympathizers are European and North American left-wingers with anarchist and Marxist backgrounds, says a study by the Reut Institute, an Israeli think-tank.

According to Israel's chief of military intelligence, Amos Yadlin, the Palestinian Authority has encouraged BDS.

A number of Jews, both in Israel and the Diaspora, have joined its ranks. Neve Gordon, a Ben-Gurion University of the Negev historian, recently wrote an op-ed piece in the Los Angeles Times endorsing BDS as "the only way to counter the apartheid trend in Israel." Israeli academics such as Ilan Pappe, Oren Ben-Dor and Tanya Reinhart have jumped on the bandwagon, too.

In Canada, the anti-globalization writer and political activist Naomi Klein, as well as an outfit known as Independent Jewish Voices, support BDS. In Britain, feminist sociology professor Hilary Rose and her husband, Steven, a neuroscientist, have also been recruited.

BDS considers its Jewish allies important, since they endow the movement with "growing legitimacy" and "moral superiority," as one of its recent communiques observed.

The BDS strategy of smearing Israel as an apartheid state hangs on a slender thread.

As someone who visited South Africa during the waning years of apartheid, I know for a fact that Israel does not fit the classic definition of apartheid South Africa.

Apartheid was a brutally enforced system of institutional racial segregation established by the white Afrikaaner and British elite to maintain its political, economic and social supremacy. Apartheid, which resembled Jim Crow laws in the United States, was based solely on pigmentation. If you were deemed to be white, you were automatically privileged. If you were black, coloured (mixed race) or Asian, you were not allowed to vote in national elections and subjected to a web of onerous and ugly restrictions based exclusively on race.

Naomi Klein

It was as simple and tragic as that.

In Israel, there is no such thing as apartheid based on racial or ethnic origin, as was the case in South Africa until the advent of a multiracial democracy. Apartheid is an alien concept in Israel.

Israeli Arabs are not disenfranchised and are almost always free to live and work where they wish. In conformity with the traditional Ottoman millet system, the vast majority of Israeli Arabs reside in Arab towns and villages on a strictly voluntary basis.

But in terms of budgetary allocations, Arab municipalities are treated unequally. As far as employment opportunities are concerned, Israeli Arabs encounter difficulties. Since 1948, Israel has appropriated much of their land. Anti-Arab racism is a deep-seated problem in Israeli society. Israel recognizes these problems, but the pace of change has been glacial.

Israeli restrictions on Arabs in the West Bank are predicated solely on security, not race. Absent terrorism, Israel would not have imposed restrictions on Palestinians in the West Bank. Yet Israel's occupation of the West Bank is a threat to its integrity as a Jewish/democratic state, never mind a blot on its image. Progressive Israeli leaders have recognized that and attempted to alter the unsustainable status quo through negotiations with the Palestinians.

BDS, having cynically overlooked these facts and distinctions, continues to press ahead with its boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign. It has not only affected Israel's academic and cultural exchanges, but put Israeli politicians (Tzipi Livni, the opposition leader) and former generals (Doron Almog and Moshe Yaalon) planning to visit Europe on notice that they may be arrested as war criminals.

Bank of Israel governor Stanley Fischer claims that the boycott of Israeli goods and services – which harkens back to the blanket Arab boycott of Israel – does not pose a real threat to Israel's economy. He may be indulging in wishful thinking, judging by recent developments.

Britain's trade unions have voted to build a mass anti-Israel boycott movement. The Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) has unanimously passed a divestment resolution. Denmark's largest bank and pension fund has divested from two Israeli companies, Africa-Israel Investments and Elbit Systems. The Belgian-French bank group, Dexia, refuses to work with West Bank Jewish councils.

CUPE has called for a boycott of academic co-operation with Israeli universities. At the 2009 Toronto International Film Festival, boycotters urged filmmakers and audiences to stay away from the program focusing on Tel Aviv. Last year, British academics asked singer Elton John to cancel a performance in Israel, while the Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid criticized the Royal Ontario Museum for exhibiting the Dead Sea Scrolls. In 2007, the assembly of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America called for a boycott of Israeli goods.

Dark clouds are forming, but Israel at present does not find itself in the same dire position as the old South Africa.

Neither non-Muslim states nor the United Nations have imposed economic sanctions against Israel. Most western companies, universities and trade unions have rejected the idea of anti-Israel boycotts, divestments and sanctions. The reason is clear: Israel is not an apartheid state in the mould of pre-democratic South Africa.

For our investors, it's a happy Passover

As we celebrate our freedom from slavery in Egypt, some of us ask: why is the Romspen Fund different from all other investments? For one thing, Romspen investors have always received their monthly distribution no matter how good or bad the economic climate.

To the many Jewish investors who depend on The Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund, we are thankful for your steadfast support and confidence. From Arthur, Mark, Wes, Blake, Shelly and our entire staff, we wish you continued good health and prosperity.

Happy Pesach.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

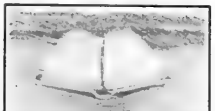
Seeing the world through Nisan

By RABBI IRA EBBIN

The Talmud teaches us that whoever goes out and sees the first blooms in the month of Nisan should make a blessing. Of course, that may work for people who live in warmer climates such as Israel. But for those of us living in Montreal or other cold places, the month of Nisan may come and go and we might still see snow in May.



Rabbinic Reflections

But rather than use the reference of spring, the Talmud uses the reference of the month of Nisan. While Nisan is referred to as "Chodesh Ha'aviv," the month of spring, perhaps the Talmud chose that reference specifically because it's encouraging us to see the world through the historical eyes of this majestic month.

This unique and special month is filled with momentous events that helped form us as a people. In the month of Nisan, our ancestors tasted freedom for the very first time.

In the month of Nisan, we witnessed God's presence come down to the world through the consecration of the Tabernacle. We were taught the definition of courage and heroism through the martyrdom of the Masada rebellion, and through the rise and fall of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising.

We also saw the miracle of life through the birth of our patriarch Isaac to his parents at the unheard of ages of 100 and 90 years old, respectively. We witnessed the fragility of life and the importance of appreciating our loved ones with the untimely and tragic passing of Aaron's children, Nadav and Avihu.

In this month of milestones, we were taught to believe in the impossible, as we experienced the miracle of the splitting of the Sea of Reeds with Moses and the splitting of the Jordan with Joshua.

If you go outside during the springtime, you will see the blooms of the trees and flowers, and the beauty of nature. But if you go outside, as the Talmud instructs, in the month of Nisan, you'll see something completely different. Seeing the world through the eyes and lenses of the month of Nisan – perhaps the most majestic month throughout the history of our people – allows us to see the beauty of the new blooms, but it also allows us to see God.

By using this special month and its incredible history of our people as the prism to see the world, one would be led, almost involuntarily, to make a blessing.

Rabbi Ira Ebbin is spiritual leader of the Beth Zion Congregation in Montreal.

Hillel, a sage for all seasons

When I was preparing for my bar mitzvah, a long time ago, my father, the rabbi of a large Orthodox congregation, made a helpful suggestion. "For your speech to the congregation, why don't you say something about the life and teachings of Hillel?"

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

Over the decades, Hillel has remained my hero, the incarnation of wisdom and righteousness.

Hillel, often called The Elder, lived at a time of Herod, 100 years before the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE.

He is perhaps best known for his treatment of proselytes, loving all people and drawing them to the Torah. Two talmudic stories about Hillel and proselytes are especially moving.

The first would-be proselyte stipulated that he would accept the written but not the oral Torah, in which he had no confidence. "Then let us learn the written Torah," said Hillel, and he started teaching him the Hebrew alphabet. On the second day, he gave the letters different names; the bet he called aleph, and the gimmel, he called bet. "But," protested his pupil, "this is wrong!"

"How do you know," asked Hillel. "If it's because of what I told you yesterday? So you relied on oral teaching. Then you must rely on the oral Torah as well."

The second would-be proselyte asked to be taught the whole Torah while standing on one leg. "What is hateful to you, do not to thy neighbour," Hillel said. "This is the whole Torah, and the rest is interpretation. Go and study."

Each proselyte is said to have first approached Shammai, who angrily rejected him. Hillel, however, accepted the challenge of each one on his own level and was thereby accepted by them in return.

For the greater part of his career, Hillel had as his antagonist, Shammai, who was rigid and unbending, strictly literal in his interpretation of scripture and logical to a fault.

His severity is illustrated by his refusal to give his child food on Yom Kippur, until the other sages forced him to do so, and his breaking open the roof of his infant grandson's room on Sukkot, that the child should observe the precept of "dwelling in booths."

Hillel's most famous enactment was the prosbol, in connection with the sabbatical year. In his time, the wealthy were adhering to the technicality of the Law, which prohibited the collecting of debts during the sabbatical year, but flouting the principal teaching of the Torah, to help the poor. Although the debt relief was meant to help the poor, creditors responded by making credit scarce when the sabbatical year grew near.

The prosbol was Hillel's device for restoring the basic precept of the Torah by enabling creditors to collect debts in the sabbatical year and after. By means of a legal fiction, Hillel allowed the deeper purpose of the Law to succeed.

An intense social conscience informs Hillel's maxims.

- "Separate not yourself from society and believe not in yourself until the day of your death."
- "Judge not your fellow man until you are in his situation."
- "The short-tempered cannot teach, and the shy-to-ask cannot learn."
- "Say not anything that cannot be understood now, in the hope that it will be ultimately understood."

As much as he believed in the need for the knowledgeable to share their spiritual gifts with the ignorant, he believed in the need for each person to discover his own inner gifts. "If I am not for myself," he said, "then who is for me" But if I am only for myself, then what am I?" And not a moment was to be lost, for "if not now, when?"

Once, when parting from his disciples, he told them he was going to perform a mitzvah. "What sort?" they asked. "The bathing of my body," he replied. "Is that a mitzvah?" they asked him. "Yes," he replied. "If the office of keeping clean and fresh the royal statues of the Romans is such a high honour, how much higher an honour is the office of keeping myself clean and fresh when I am created in the image of God?"

For me, and I am sure for others, the most memorable and challenging words of Hillel are these: "In a place where no one behaves like a human being, you must strive to be human."

Countering hate is not all there is

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

As the now-annual Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) has come and gone – with its ritualistic sloganeering, its pious condemnations of "Israeli atrocities" and, ironically, its utter desecration of Muslim rights and dignity by wilfully ignoring tragic and widespread Muslim-on-Muslim violence and murder, as well as Arab state-sponsored misogyny, and the trampling of gay and minority rights in supposedly "non-occupying" entities – perhaps it's a good time to take stock.

There was a great deal of rhetoric poured back and forth – in speeches, articles, rallies, letters to the editor of major newspapers and so forth – by members of the Jewish community, alternatively decrying IAW as racist or defending it as necessary and a wake-up call for Israel.

Assuming goodwill on both sides of the political spectrum – and that is a reach in certain cases – I'm still disturbed at what this energy tells us about where the priorities of many Jews lie. It's a good thing to articulate one's position and to rebut what one feels are misleading or even mendacious ideas or statements by one's opponents. But in some cases, support for or opposition to IAW, or other issues organized only around the question of Zionism, have become substitutions for any other form of Jewish involvement.

The toxicity of certain kinds of Jewish self-loathing – what historian Alvin Rosenfeld calls "being proud to be ashamed" to be Jews, continues unabated. You know who you are. You rush to the forefront of public denunciations of Israel, as though you can't prove your human rights bona fides quickly enough to those whose objectivity regarding Israel is dubious at best. I don't deny your freedom to speak. What I'm less convinced of is whether your freedom is coupled with wisdom.

Judaism, too, has its annual rituals, and as Pesach approaches, it's worth considering what was perhaps the very first outbreak of anti-Semitism, that of Pharaoh and his followers. Concocting systematic oppression out of the lies of demagoguery, Pharaoh convinces his people that the Jews are a threat to peace and national security and must be put in their place. His heart hardened long before God got around to him.

I don't reject, on its face, anti-Israel criticism, which is the prerogative of democracies (read: Israel alone in the Middle East). But it does often seem, in reading what passes for history in certain quarters – accounts of the "genocidal" war on Gaza and the "racist apartheid wall" – that thousands of bombs had not dropped in Sderot for seven years; that suicide bombers had not streamed through the previously non-walled sections of the West Bank, and that Arabs didn't riot in Hebron in 1929 and massacre Jews en masse. Is this the contemporary version of "hardening of the heart," when we disregard facts in favour of predetermined ideology?

I don't know. But Jewishness is, the last time I checked, a 24/7 identity, not something we invoke as a reaction to IAW organizers. Autonomy, I suppose, can be used to respond to someone else's agenda, or to purposefully construct one's own. Let's not use our liberation from Egypt exclusively to reply to what we perceive as anti-Semitism and have to do with little else that is Jewish. In the end, that sounds like another, more subtle, brand of slavery.

Passover, diabetes and calories

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The average Israeli gains one to three kilograms over Passover. [bit.ly/psch26] Do you think you're so different on this side of the Atlantic?

Whether you've decided to cut down on fat or calories, or are vegetarian or diabetic, there are plenty of Passover dishes you can enjoy.

Nutritionist Fran Berkoff recommends "a good non-stick pan, some chicken broth or vegetable broth for sautéing or as a base for salad dressings. If a recipe calls for a half-cup of oil, try cutting to a third and, if this works, try cutting down even further. Substitute unsaturated oils for chicken fat in traditional recipes and perk up flavours with lemon juice and/or generous amounts of fresh herbs. Instead of piling lots of butter on your matzah, try some jam." [bit.ly/psch19]

You can escape the mega-oil, mega-egg, fat-laden dishes if you cook creatively. Even Philip Goldwasser's mother doesn't buy 20 dozen eggs, as she used to when Philip was growing up. How does she do it? "First, use less eggs! Any dish that calls for eggs can usually be lessened by one egg. Not all dishes, but most. Another way to deal with this is to substitute egg whites for eggs. Let's say that you have a recipe that calls for four eggs. You can use two whole eggs and two egg whites." [bit.ly/psch41]

More than 20 years ago, Nechama Cohen began to exhibit severe symptoms of diabetes. That change in her life also sparked Cohen to eventually found the Jewish Diabetes Association, to raise awareness about the challenges and solutions for Jews living with diabetes. "Our eating requirements are intimately bound up with our religion, culture and ethnic identity. A Jewish person with diabetes needs to learn how to navigate their way through all these eating opportunities, and stay in control of their blood sugar levels. Go and try to explain to a doctor why you absolutely have to have four cups of wine at one meal and a given amount of matzah. I do not know if anybody knew the carbohydrate content of matzah balls until we came along!" [bit.ly/psch21]

The association's guide, Eating Right for Passover, is a bilingual English/Hebrew booklet that includes: using a food scale on Pesach; how to time your taking of insulin to coincide with the seder meal; sugar substitutes that are kosher for Passover; illustrations of recommended quantities of matzah to be eaten during the seder; glucose and carbohydrate levels of common Passover wines; and how to water down wine and still fulfil the requirements of the Four Glasses. [bit.ly/ psch22]

What can someone with diabetes enjoy on seder nights? Diabetic-Lifestyle.com recommends Spring Vegetable Soup with Scallion and Dill-Flecked Matzah Balls, Beef Brisket with Oranges and Grilled Pineapple with Raspberry Purée. [bit.ly/psch23]

And over at Diabetic-Recipes.com, you'll find a Passover menu consisting of Roasted Leg of Lamb, Fresh Asparagus with Lemon and Fresh Strawberries and Rhubarb. [bit.ly/psch24]

For blogger T'Mana, Passover reminds her of her diabetes, the bad and the good. When it comes to the Plagues, she sees the following parallels.

- Blood – blood work, blood tests.
- Boils – OK, not the same thing, but diabetic ulcers come to mind.
- Darkness – diabetic retinopathy – what else? [bit.ly/psch25]

At the same time, T'Mana says there is also the "Dayenu," much to be grateful for. "Given the state of diabetes care today, we can say that most of us have been 'delivered' from a premature death – or at least, from a much more premature death than we might otherwise have had. All of us have the tools to monitor and treat our condition. Many of us lead 'normal' lives, with diabetes being no more an interruption of that routine than daily prayers… Take a moment tonight, and consider: what still enslaves you? what liberates you? And for what are you grateful – both in terms of your diabetes and in terms of your life in general?"

Leonard Wolinsky Lectures' speakers, from left, Professor Martin D. Yaffe, Professor Hava Tirosh-Samuelson and Jeremy Benstein, with Mira Adler, director, Leonard Wolinsky Foundation; and Professor Eric Lawee, acting director, Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies, York University.

Jewish perspective given on environmental change

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

This year's Leonard Wolinsky Lectures on Jewish Life and Education explored environmental challenges in contemporary Jewish perspective and the relationship of Jews with the natural world.

Held on March 7 at York University, the lecture series featured three speakers who discussed the extent to which Judaism is part of the environmental problem, as well as how it can become part of the solution.

Philosophy and religious studies professor Martin Yaffe, of the University of North Texas, debated whether a Jew can be "a skeptical environmentalist"; history professor Hava Tirosh-Samuelson, of Arizona State University, spoke on the subject of nature and renewal in modern Jewish thought; and Jeremy Benstein, deputy director of the Heschel Center for Environmental Learning and Leadership in Tel Aviv, examined Jewish legal teachings on environmental issues.

Yaffe, author of Judaism and Environmental Ethics: A Reader, raised several interrelated questions. Does the Bible, or Jewish tradition, teach environmental responsibility? Which Jewish teachings address today's environmental crisis? Do ecology and Judaism work together, or are they at odds with each other in confronting the current crisis?

Yaffe said critics who often reflect on professor Lynn Townsend White's 1967 article titled The Historical Roots of Our Ecologic Crisis blame religion for creating and sustaining the western world's destructive attitude toward the exploitation of nature. Yaffe said such thinkers place a focus on Genesis 1:28 and its declarations of human dominion and obligation to "fill the earth and master it."

This focus has historically resulted in the dispute between an interpretation of absolute control and that of stewardship, Yaffe said. In his attempt to discredit White's attack on the Torah and the theory that humans view land as their own commodity, Yaffe asked what alternative perspectives might be more useful.

Posing counter evidence by looking at the Jewish ecological track record, he said nature should be seen as "a divine moral tool" as well as a creation over which humans have only limited mastery. As evident in Genesis 2:15, God put humans on earth "to work it and to guard it," meaning God wants us to use the planet for our needs while being careful to preserve and not destroy it.

Like Yaffe, Tirosh-Samuelson acknowledged that religions play an important role in creating a sustainable future. She said religions are "the repositories of values and norms that guide human actions toward the natural world," helping shape how we act toward the environment.

Referring to Samson Raphael Hirsch, a German rabbi known as the intellectual founder of modern Orthodox Judaism, Tirosh-Samuelson stated that Jews have the right to rule nature, but must respect their environment according to God's will. Hirsch described improper use of the world's resources as theft from God, she said.

"There is an ethic of responsibility towards nature," said Tirosh-Samuelson, emphasizing that each creature belongs to God and that humans have privileges that entail obligations. Progress coupled with self-discipline and growth, and balanced by conservation and protection, are the Torah's ecological agenda, she suggested, stating that the world "is a chain of giving and receiving."

Benstein, who has published articles exploring the relationship Jews have with the natural world and the ways in which Judaism contributes to social-environmental issues, concluded the lecture series by discussing the "tragedy of the commons" and how the ecological crisis can be remedied.

Benstein offered both an environmental analysis of Judaism and a Jewish perspective on environmentalism, as he examined the dilemmas and questions we face when evaluating religion's role in the care of creation. What he called "the environmental predicament" can be viewed as a challenge able to be better managed through regulation.

Jewish teachings, such as the laws of damages found in Exodus, suggest that people can hurt each other through harming the land. Since the commons belong to everyone, altruism is expected, Benstein said.

"Our society is far from ideal. For too long we have enjoyed the fruit and paid no heed to preserving the fruitfulness. One imperative, then, for long and good lives here on the earth, for us collectively as a society, is treating the natural world with reverence and restraint."

Israeli doctor recalls IDF's Haiti mission

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

They were two "meaningful," unusual weeks in the life of an Israeli physician.

Or as Dr. Ofer Merin put it, "It was a privilege to help people in need in a chaotic situation."

Merin, a heart surgeon, deputy director of the Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem and a lieutenant-colonel in Israel's army reserves, was in Toronto last week to discuss Israel's much-lauded mission of mercy in Haiti.

Within 24 hours of the devastating Jan. 12 earthquake that displaced three million Haitians, killed more than 200,000 and injured some 300,000, Israel dispatched a fully equipped field hospital to the impoverished Caribbean nation.

Merin, who received part of his training at Toronto's Sunnybrook Hospital, was in charge of the tented facility.

To Merin, Haiti was terra incognita, "a country none of us knew," he said in a talk and slide show at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation presented by the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, the Speakers Action Group and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Dr. Ofer Merin

Yet the Israeli medical team – consisting of 40 doctors, 20 nurses, 20 paramedics and medics and 20 lab and X-ray technicians and administrators – was ready for the challenge.

"We responded very quickly," said Merin, whose improvised field hospital treated 1,111 Haitians, performed 315 operations and delivered 16 babies, including a set of twins.

The Israelis left in two aircraft – a passenger plane carrying personnel and a cargo plane with 30 tons of equipment, including ultrasound machines and incubators. Their flight to Port-au-Prince, Haiti's capital, took 16 hours.

Although they were unfamiliar with Haiti, three Israeli physicians who preceded them to their destination sent vital intelligence, thereby preparing the way.

The fully operational Israeli field hospital was set up in a soccer field in the centre of the city and was split into surgical and internal medicine branches.

"The word spread very quickly where we were," Merin said. "Some patients arrived in wheelbarrows."

Each patient was registered and photographed, their vital medical information entered into a laptop computer.

Most patients were treated for open limb fractures. Limbs had to be saved, because most Haitians can't afford prosthetics, Merin said.

In general, Haitians with life-threatening injuries received priority, he noted.

But in some cases, this rule was waived. "We had to be flexible," he explained.

Patients were sent away within a day of surgery, but Merin and his staff had no idea where "home" was, since so many residential buildings were destroyed by the powerful earthquake.

Despite all efforts, 13 Haitians treated by the Israelis died.

Merin said he worked under a weighty burden of emotional stress. "There is no good answer as to how we maintained our sanity," he said.

Before starting his day, he jogged for an hour.

Having finished their tour of duty, the Israelis left behind their equipment, and a lot of goodwill.

For a nation whose international image requires improvement, the mission was a public relations triumph for Israel.

Fashion show to raise awareness of abused women

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Goldie Plotkin isn't interested in helping a charity's public relations department. She's interested in bettering lives.

"Obviously there are many charities that need our help," she said of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham and its charity fashion show, which will be held on March 21.

"Some organizations have wonderful marketing tools and great PR agents. A lot of their money goes for PR and ads," she said. "[There are] very obscure, very well hidden charities, I guess they don't have PR, they're not part of the hoo-haw of Toronto."

Alternative Short-Term Emergency Housing (ASTEH) is one of these charities.

ASTEH, a joint initiative between Jewish Family and Child (JF&CS) and Jewish Women International of Canada (JWIC), is a shelter for abused Jewish women and their children that includes kosher amenities and emotional support for its clients.

"I like to support a charity where every single penny we give goes to the charity. It's not going to pay for advertising, our money goes straight to helping a mother with her children," Plotkin, the fashion show's organizer, said.

Chabad holds a charity event either every year or every other year, and about 20 per cent of proceeds goes to local charities.

For Penny Krowitz, the executive director of JWIC, the show isn't just about funds, it's about raising awareness for an issue that many in the Jewish community would rather ignore, she said.

Goldie Plotkin

"Unless you need it, you don't pay attention to it... many people say to me, 'I didn't know [the shelter] existed,'" she said.

Because ASTEH is a joint initiative between JF&CS and JWIC, the shelter provides social work services as well as volunteer services such as babysitting children while clients are in court or helping women find an apartment when they're ready to leave.

"The issue of violence against women, particularly in the Jewish community, is not really one people like to talk about," Krowitz said. "We want to feel that we are different from the rest of society. Unfortunately, that isn't true."

One of Krowitz's aims, both for the fashion show and through JWIC in general, is to promote education about this issue.

Penny Krowitz

"Many people don't understand what constitutes abuse against women. This will give us an opportunity to educate the public... as well as being the recipient of fundraising dollars."

Krowitz sees the fashion show as a good forum to spread her message.

"There will be predominately women [at the show]. Women need to be aware of this both for their own lives and the lives of those they care about," she said.

The fashion show, called a Celebration of the Generations, will be at the Hudson Bay Company's flagship location on Queen Street and will include about 45 models of all ages.

"All [of Chabad's] activities include grandparents, parents, children. We celebrate all the different life cycles," Plotkin said. "I'm not about size zero models, that's anorexia. I want to show very healthy women, beautiful women."

Plotkin expects about 400 to 500 people to attend the show, which will include a raffle and a speech by Judy Feld Carr, who rescued more than 3,000 Jews from Syria.

Tickets are $65, and $36 for students and seniors. For more information or to order tickets, call 905-886-0420, ext. 227, or visit www.chabadmarkham.org.

Phase II of Lebovic Community Campus construction underway

New Schwartz/Reisman Centre slated to open in Fall of 2012

By Barbra Green & Daniel Horowitz

The second phase of construction on Vaughan's Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus is well underway, further transforming what was barren farm land just a decade ago into an unprecedented model of Jewish life in North America.

After a period of relative quiet, the cranes and excavators returned to the 50-acre site just north of Bathurst Street and Rutherford Road in December to resume their duties.

"We have reached a very important milestone in the development of both the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus and the Jewish community-at-large," said Lou Greenbaum, past chair of the Lebovic Campus Development & Building Committee. "It's a marvelous feat and it says volumes about the success and the vibrancy of the Jewish community in Greater Toronto."

Construction on the state-of-the-art Schwartz/Reisman Centre at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus is underway.

"When we found this land in 1999, there were no roads, no sewers, no water," said Leo Goldhar, the former co-chair of the Land Acquisition Committee and the former chair of the Lebovic Steering Committee, and the recently named chair of the UJA Joint Campus Committee. "When I hired the architect, Guela Solow-Ruda, she prepared a master plan showing the schools, community centre, affordable housing, seniors' housing. Seeing it on paper is one thing, but seeing it come to life is quite another. We already have built a phenomenal high school with TanenbaumCHAT at the Kimel Family Education Centre, and the Schwartz/Reisman Centre (SRC) is now under construction. Our community has risen to the occasion and we have set a new standard in Jewish communities."

The state-of-the-art SRC – a hub of health and wellness, arts and culture, education and, of course, recreation – will encompass approximately 100,000 sq. ft. in two of the campus' busiest buildings. It will include the Phil Granovsky Sports & Recreation Pavilion, a cutting-edge Fitness and Conditioning Centre, the Gorman Shore Goodman Childhood Education Centre and a Community Arts Centre.

"Laying the foundation for this growing, thriving Jewish community is a source of great pride for us and our family," said Gerry Schwartz, co-chair of the Tomorrow Campaign, who along with his wife, Heather Reisman, provided the lead gift for the SRC. "The Schwartz/Reisman Centre, at the heart of this amazing campus, will be a resource – a beacon – for community members of all ages and interests."

The existing Sydney & Florence Cooper & Family Sports Hall, a vast gymnasium complex already in use at TanenbaumCHAT at the Kimel Family Education Centre, will ultimately connect to the SRC, creating just one of many practical shared spaces on campus. The shells (or superstructures) of the Community Services Pavilion and the Conference & Celebration Pavilion will also be built during this phase, along with a significant portion of the Sharp Family Atrium.

"To see this project, this incredible campus moving forward means so much to my brother Wolf and I," said Joseph Lebovic.

Completion of the Schwartz/Reisman Centre is slated for the spring/summer of 2012, with a grand opening slated for the fall. The Mount Sinai Family Health and Wellness Centre, on the third floor of the Community Services Pavilion, is scheduled to open at the same time.

Completion of the Schwartz/Reisman Centre is slated for 2012.

CJN columnist, 90, reflects on life and Judaism

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

This weekend Rabbi Bernard Baskin will celebrate his 90th birthday with family and friends.

"I think if one is in good health and is lucky enough to reach 90, it's a source of celebration," he said in a telephone interview last Wednesday from Boca Raton, Fla., the day after his March 9 birthday.

The rabbi – who served Hamilton's Temple Anshe Sholom from 1949 until his retirement 20 years ago, and who still maintains an office there as rabbi emeritus – believes that "if one reaches old age and is in relatively good health, one should persist in trying to maintain some kind of involvement in life."

This year marks the third winter he has spent in Florida, but he is still lecturing and preaching, he noted. In fact, he was anticipating a trip to Edmonton to speak to the Jewish community there April 15.

In Hamilton, in addition to having headed Anshe Sholom – which he says is the oldest Reform congregation in Canada, taking into account the age of its cemetery – Rabbi Baskin has also been involved in interfaith work and community cultural matters.

Recognition he has received for his work includes a 1959 honorary doctorate from McMaster University, and a B'nai Brith Humanitarian Award for his interfaith involvement. As well, he served on the university's senate, was voted into the Hamilton Gallery of Distinction, and is a former Negev Dinner honoree.

A regular columnist for The CJN for some 50 years, Rabbi Baskin has also written many articles and book reviews for the Hamilton Spectator. His CJN column now appears once a month.

Rabbi Bernard Baskin

In 2008, to mark his 60 years with Anshe Sholom, the congregation held a public event attended by 450 people, and published a book of Rabbi Baskin's writings, The Essential Bernard Baskin. The temple now has 420 families, making it the largest of Hamilton's three synagogues, and is headed by Rabbi Jordan Cohen.

Rabbi Baskin has had a lifelong interest in books; as a youngster he thought he might teach English literature in a high school when he grew up, and following his retirement, he and his late wife, Marjorie, who died five years ago, ran a book business, mostly selling Judaica. Last year, he donated 8,000 volumes to the University of Alberta, following a suggestion from an Edmonton bookseller with whom he was acquainted.

The rabbi has given book talks at McMaster and at the Hamilton Public Library, where he served as chair for many years. He also gives 12 lectures a year to groups of 80 to 100 people at the temple. "It keeps me intellectually stimulated," he said.

Lecturing, preaching, keeping up with world politics and "reading that matters," as well as his ties with family and friends, all lead to "a rather full and I would say interesting life," the rabbi said.

"Older people, if they're able, should choose to remain in life, not withdraw. This requires the luxury of good health, [but] even people who are not in excellent good health should try to maintain some kind of involvement," he advised. "I think withdrawal leads eventually to a kind of inertia, both physical and mental, and that leads to, I think, a quick demise."

To stay healthy, the rabbi said, "one has to be realistic about one's diet, to try to remain within reasonable good weight, to maintain some kind of regimen of exercise, to stay alert, to have a schedule, to have friends, stay away from smoking if possible, alcohol in moderation. All these things lead to better health, one hopes.

"And then, of course," he added dryly, "you have to choose your parents very carefully."

A native of New Brunswick, N.J., Rabbi Baskin was raised in an Orthodox home in Brooklyn, N.Y. His father, Rabbi Samuel Baskin, served a large congregation there.

A graduate of Brooklyn College, Rabbi Baskin was ordained at the Jewish Institute of Religion in New York in 1947, before serving congregations in Denver and then Baton Rouge, La. The seminary later merged with Cincinnati's Hebrew Union College.

Rabbi Baskin said that as he grew up, he became increasingly less convinced that Orthodoxy was for him. "I found it quite restrictive. I also found that many of its teachings were things I couldn't accept, which seemed to in many ways contradict what I thought about the universe," he recalled.

At one time, he considered becoming a Conservative rabbi.

His father never argued with him about his choice, he said. "I'm sure he would have liked if I had become more Conservative, but… I think he was pleased that I chose the rabbinate to serve in the Jewish community."

Seen major changes in Reform Judaism

Reflecting on his long career, Rabbi Baskin said he both liked and found meaning in the rabbinate.

"I've lived through such momentous and cataclysmic events as the Holocaust, the Second World War, and, of course, the birth of Israel," he said. "The Holocaust has made for tremendous changes in Jewish life. We no longer have a community in eastern Europe, which was the dominant community until North America. We no longer have a community in the Arab countries. At one time, we had a strong Sephardic community in the Arab countries. That's all disappeared with the birth of Israel."

Rabbi Baskin's late brother, Leonard, the well-known American artist.

Israel – which Rabbi Baskin said he visited with congregants before such trips became popular – "has become the centre of our concern, the centre of our involvement."

Having visited a dozen times, and with a granddaughter who has made aliyah and is serving in the Israel Defence Forces, the rabbi said he has "a strong connection with Eretz Yisrael."

Since his ordination, he has seen major changes in Reform Judaism, and in Judaism in general. Women are now routinely ordained as rabbis and cantors in the non-Orthodox movements, and in the Reform movement, there has been a return to more ritual and greater use of Hebrew at services.

"I think that's all favourable," Rabbi Baskin said. Speaking of ritual in particular, he said he thinks that "for Judaism to exist and continue, you need things like ritual to add colour and meaning to Jewish life."

On a personal note, Rabbi Baskin wanted to talk about his family and how proud he is of them: his son David, a former president of Holy Blossom Temple whose wife Joan Garson is president of the Reform Zionist umbrella, Arzenu; daughter Judith, an author and professor of Jewish studies at the University of Oregon; daughter Susan, a music teacher who used to teach at Leo Baeck Day School; and seven grandchildren.

Judith Baskin

As well, he added, his late wife was head of the Hamilton-Wentworth District School Board, and his late brother, Leonard, was a well-known American artist who illustrated A Passover Haggadah and whose works are in major museums.

When the rabbi arrived in Hamilton in 1949 – succeeding noted philosopher Rabbi Emil Fackenheim – he and his wife intended to stay only a few years.

But with the birth of their children and their growing involvement in and appreciation of the community, "fate ordained otherwise," Rabbi Baskin said.

Oil discovery changed a Galician community

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Drohobych, situated at the confluence of two rivers in Galicia, was a remote, tradition-bound town when a significant quantity of oil was discovered in the vicinity in the mid-19th century.

The discovery changed Drohobych, modernizing and catapulting it into the industrial era.

For Israeli scholar and lecturer Shalmi Bar-Mor, the industrialization of Drohobych is a microcosm of what modernity wrought in Jewish communities in eastern Europe more than a century ago.

Shalmi Bar-Mor

"This is really the story of capitalism," said Bar-Mor, who was in Toronto recently to speak on the topic at an event sponsored by the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada at Congregation Habonim.

"This small place became an industrial centre," added Bar-Mor, the director of the Education Culture Heritage Organization, based in Mevasseret Zion.

Drohobych had a population of about 18,000 and was part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire on the eve of the event that transformed it.

Nearly half of its inhabitants were Jewish, while the remainder were Ukrainian, Polish and Russian.

Bar-Mor, a former Hebrew University historian who headed Yad Vashem's education department from 1972 to 1995, doesn't know what quantities of oil were discovered there. "But it was a lot for the time," he said.

Indeed, the refinery that was built to accommodate the flow was one of the biggest in Europe.

Jews were involved in the oil business from top to bottom as developers, investors and workers, said Bar-Mor in an interview.

The boom altered the socio-economic structure of the town, nourished an artistic awakening within the framework of the Enlightenment and opened up the Jewish community to the wider world.

A middle class, with an intelligentsia, emerged. Progressive Judaism took hold as Orthodoxy became more insular. Jews entered the professions and were increasingly Polonized, noted Bar-Mor, whose parents immigrated to Palestine from Poland in the 1930s.

With Drohobych prospering, Jewish painters such as Maurycy and Leopold Gottlieb developed their craft.

Bruno Schultz, the Jewish writer, graphic artist and literary critic widely known as the Polish Kafka, was born in Drohobych and lived there until the Nazis killed him.

After World War I, Drohobych briefly became part of the West Ukrainian National Republic and then was incorporated into newly independent Poland.

When Germany occupied it, almost 40 per cent of its residents were Jewish. Many Jews were murdered during the Holocaust – Bar-Mor has no figures – but some survived.

Drohobych passed into Soviet hands after World War II, its economy buttressed by the oil refining, machine, woodworking and food industries.

Now within the territory of post-Soviet Ukraine, Drohobych, with a population of 77,000, no longer has a functioning Jewish community, much less Jews. The building that once housed a synagogue has been converted into a furniture warehouse.

"There's nothing Jewish there anymore," said Bar-Mor, who has twice visited the town in the past five years, most recently last summer. "What you see is a void."

Israeli media judge housing announcement harshly

U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden's visit to Israel last week was met with controversy when Israel's Interior Ministry announced plans for 1,600 new homes in east Jerusalem, prompting Biden and the U.S. administration in Washington to strongly criticize the announcement. The controversy arose just as Israel and the Palestinian Authority were set to resume indirect peace talks.

According to Reports

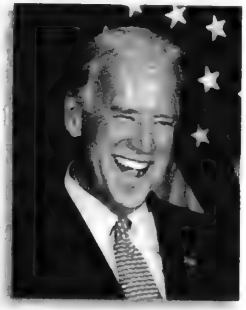
By PAUL MICHAELS

Headlines in Canadian news media on March 10 were almost uniform: "Biden condemns Israel over new homes" (National Post); "Biden condemns Israel's latest settlement plan" (Ottawa Citizen); "Biden condemns Israeli settlement expansion move" (Edmonton Journal); "U.S. hits Israeli east Jerusalem plan" (Winnipeg Free Press); "Biden slams new Israeli settlements" (Toronto Sun).

The Toronto Star carried two reports by Olivia Ward. Her lead story, "Middle East talks stumble," dealt with Biden's reaction to the housing issue. Ward's second story, "Washington 'committed' to ensuring Israel secure," described the main thrust of Biden's visit – to assure Israeli leaders that the United States will do everything necessary to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons and, thereby, also to convince Israel not to attack Iran's nuclear facilities.

The Globe and Mail was alone in placing Biden's comments on Iran front and centre. In Paul Koring's story, "Biden aims harsh words at Iran on visit to Israel," he confined Biden's reaction to the housing announcement to the latter part of the report.

In Israel, media analysis and comment was harshly critical of the Interior Ministry's move, especially its timing while Biden was just beginning his visit and, as some commentators noted, was blindsided.



Vice-President Joe Biden

The March 10, Jerusalem Post editorial "Dysfunctional government" called the Interior Ministry's announcement "a staggering example of diplomatic obtuseness" and added that "the timing of the announcement immediately threatened the 'proximity talks' in which Netanyahu has stressed Israel has a profound interest. It united the Palestinians, the Arab world and much of the international community in a chorus of anti-Israel condemnation."

In his Ha'aretz column headlined "Broken glass," Ari Shavit wrote that "The [Iranian] threat against Israel is unprecedented. Our need for the United States is unprecedented. At this critical juncture, any national interest should be subservient to the supreme interest of strengthening this alliance."

In " Visiting Biden slams E. J'lem housing plan" (Mar. 10), Ha'aretz reporters noted that Netanyahu told Biden that he did not know in advance about the decision to authorize the additional construction.

They added: "Netanyahu also told Biden that the planning and building councils are not under the government's direct authority, and that his administration tries not to interfere with their work. 'No one was seeking to embarrass you or undermine your visit,' the prime minister reportedly said. 'On the contrary – you are a true friend to Israel.'

"Nevertheless, a high-ranking official in Jerusalem said Netanyahu has 'no problem' with construction in Jerusalem and has no intention of apologizing for building there."

On Mar. 10 CBC News Network's News Now, host Carole MacNeil interviewed Mark Regev, Netanyahu's spokeperson.

MacNeil: "Is your prime minister embarrassed that he didn't know about this [housing announcement]"?

Regev: "Well let's say it wasn't our finest hour. But anyone who works in a democratic system [knows that] only in totalitarian countries does the central government control every aspect of society. When you have local governments, when you have different ministries, these things are bound to happen. Obviously you want to try to keep it to a minimum… The most important thing is that… we want to move forward in the peace process, we want to deal with the issue of Iran to make sure they don't go nuclear – there's a whole series of issues where Israel and the United States – and also Canada – are working together to try to deal with these challenges."

This column recently argued that housing and settlements, although an important final status issue, are not "the" key impediment to progress on peace, as much of the world claims, and that other more critical final status subjects need to be examined.

However, with incidents such as the controversy described above, "settlements" are all the international community is likely to remain fixated on in the foreseeable future.

Neuroscience links Israeli, Palestinian scientists

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

Neuroscience professor Mark Gluck has been working for seven years to bridge the gap between Israeli and Palestinian doctors and scientists in his field.

Gluck, professor of neuroscience at Rutgers University-Newark and co-director of the Rutgers Memory Disorders Project, has been an active partner with the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and Al-Quds University medical school in east Jerusalem in setting up joint brain research exchanges and conferences – a mission he discussed in Toronto last month at an event co-hosted by the Maimonides Society of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Young Health Professionals.

Gluck, along with Hagai Bergman, professor of neuroscience at Hebrew U, spearheaded the first international scientific conference hosted by the Israeli and Palestinian universities in June 2005. The landmark event focused on interdisciplinary approaches to understanding Parkinson's disease and took place on both campuses.

While the conference brought together more than 200 researchers and physicians from Israel, the West Bank, Jordan, England, France, Canada and the United States, Gluck said science was not his only focus. The three-day program was his symbolic response to the increase in anti-Israeli boycotts in academia at the time.

The boycott movement began in Britain in 2002 to protest Israel's treatment of Palestinians. More than 120 scientists and scholars from across Europe urged a ban on educational and cultural links with the Jewish state.

"I feel a strong connection with Israel, and when I first heard about the boycotts, it offended me twice over," Gluck said. "These are my fellow Jews. They're also my fellow scientists. They're my brethren. So my feeling was that Rutgers could to do something about this by organizing an international conference in Israel with leading scientists."

Gluck said the initiative exceeded his expectations, as he did not think his team would be able to get the Palestinians involved as partners. He said the conference allowed Rutgers to improve Israel's relationship with the Arab world, which is crucial to the nation's long-term strength.

The 2005 conference was not a one-time thing, Gluck said, as a second international convention focusing on Alzheimer's disease was held in May 2008. Gluck organized the three-day event, co-hosted by Rutgers-Newark, Hebrew U and Al-Quds University, with his colleagues in Israel and the West Bank.

Hebrew U, Al-Quds set up joint brain research programs

Gluck was one of over 50 scholars, scientists and students from the United States and Europe who shared findings at the conference, which provided another chance for Israelis and Palestinians to collaborate, he said.

More than 20 Palestinians attended the sessions at Hebrew U, and though some already had permits to work in Israeli hospitals, Gluck said he spent months arranging entry for over a dozen Palestinians from the West Bank who would normally be denied easy access.

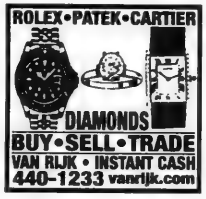
Gluck said one of the main goals of the 2008 conference was to set up a new Middle East Collaborative Research Consortium on Brain Disorders to benefit the entire region. He said the opportunity was "a novel one for Israeli-Arab co-operation [that] promotes Israel as a valued neighbour for regional health care."

Gluck said he began to build trust by meeting with families of the Palestinian students, but with the outbreak of war in Gaza in December 2008, communication between the Arabs and the Jews was shut down. "The program was put on hold due to politics and discomfort," he said.

In response to the conflict, Gluck and Dr. Adel Misk, a leading Palestinian neurologist affiliated with Al-Quds, established the Rutgers-Israel Biomedical Research and Education Exchange. The project has grown into a program for study and collaborative research, bringing Rutgers students and faculty to Israel and Israeli scientists and students to Rutgers. Gluck said certain initiatives have also provided opportunities for Rutgers students to participate in collaborative programs with Palestinian universities.

In future efforts, Gluck said Rutgers will assist in the establishment of a Palestinian Neurosciences Institute at Al-Quds University. Housed on the Abu Dis campus, it will provide training and research support for Palestinian medical students, doctors and scientists.

The Palestinian Neurosciences Institute will also administer a broader Palestinian Neurosciences Society, open to Palestinian scientists, doctors and students worldwide. The society will apply for recognition from international organizations and seek representation at global conferences.



Israel conversion bill angers Diaspora Jews

The annulment provision "suggests someone who converts to Judaism could have their conversion overturned," contrary to longstanding Jewish practice, Rabbi Stroh said.

And the clause restricting application of the Law of Return to people born Jewish or those converted abroad (providing they've never visited Israel prior to their conversion) violates an ancient principle of Judaism, which "does not make any distinction between those born Jews and those who convert. They're 100 per cent Jews," he said.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said the legislation started out trying to decentralize the conversion process in Israel by giving that power to local rabbis. But during negotiations to advance the bill, "Rotem essentially capitulated to the chief rabbi, so he made the situation worse. The chief rabbi will determine who at the local level is okay to handle this. It only appears to decentralize, but in a sense, it only strengthens the hand of the chief rabbi."

Over the past 10 years, the haredi establishment in Israel had continued to "devalue" Reform and Conservative Judaism, and in the last two years, it has devalued "liberal Orthodox rabbis," limiting the acceptance of their conversions, he said.

Rabbi Stroh said that "the whole thing is a political manoeuvre by the Israeli Orthodox rabbinate to get more control and power over Jews and the State of Israel."

That's a view shared in Israel by Rabbi Michael Melchior, former minister for Diaspora relations. He said the dispute over the bill, and the threat by the Ashkenazi haredi party (United Torah Judaism) to bolt the government over the bill are "a classical example of how we mess up things at the highest level."

Rabbi Melchior said Rotem's bill, before it was amended at the behest of haredi parties (Shas and United Torah Judaism), resembled one he had proposed years ago.

"The bill was an attempt, without breaking all the principles and rules regarding conversions, to make conversions a little bit easier" by permitting city rabbis across Israel to perform them, he said.

By treating all of Israel as a single jurisdiction for the purpose of conversion, a convert could choose any rabbi he felt comfortable with, and it would prevent a second rabbi from overturning that conversion, he said.

As the bill proceeded through the deliberative process in the Knesset, the Chief Rabbinate wanted a clause inserted to give it sole authority to annul conversions, while "the ultra-Orthodox, who control everybody and everything, made a big fuss about this," Rabbi Melchior said.

They will support the bill only if conversions are limited to rabbis approved by the Chief Rabbinate – effectively shutting out moderate rabbis, he added.

It would put an end to the country's conversion institute, which has special religious courts headed by Rabbi Haim Druckman, established to streamline the process, and which includes the input of Conservative and Reform Judaism. The institute "was a real, serious attempt to do something for the unity of the Jewish people," he said.

(The conversion courts have experienced a crisis in recent years, in part as a result of rabbinic court rulings that voided thousands of conversions.)

Giving the Chief Rabbinate sole authority over the legitimacy of conversions is a departure from current practice and gives the chief rabbi authority that does not exist now in Israel, Rabbi Melchior said.

The result, he predicted, is that "more Jews will feel estranged from the State of Israel. Israel speaks to all Jews and the children of Jews, and we cannot afford to send a signal to the non-Orthodox world that they are not welcome in the State of Israel."

Rabbi Stroh said controversies such as the conversion bill make the job of the Reform movement in Israel that much harder. "Orthodox control makes Judaism very unpalatable to many Israelis," he said. In effect, it gives religion a bad name and "makes it hard for Reform and Conservative to bring Judaism to Israelis."

In a news release, the Jewish Federations of North America, which represents 157 federated communities and 400 smaller centres, called on the Israeli government to enter a dialogue with Diaspora Jews before amending the Law of Return.

That issue "is of urgent importance to our communities," the news release said.

"We implore the Israeli government to seriously consider the concerns and sensitivities of Diaspora Jews before acting on such proposals. Changes to the Law of Return could adversely affect many members of our community by preventing them from making aliyah and becoming Israeli citizens. Any action of this type would be an affront to world Jewry."

Sharansky, a former MK, said the bill went from one intended to address question of conversions by municipal rabbis to one affecting citizenship and the issue of who is a Jew.

"The last thing Israel needs is to open a front against the many Jews who live in the Diaspora," he told the Jerusalem Post.

Echoing the language of critics of Israel's haredi parties, Rabbi Melchior said, "I'm very sad… The Torah does not allow us to embarrass or hurt the feelings of people who want to convert to Judaism, and that's being forgotten in the power play and politics."

Rabbi Melchior is not optimistic about the resolution of the issue. Although the bill is currently in limbo, "the Zionist parties probably couldn't care less" about concerns of North American Jews. "It's not a big issue in Israel. It's not something that concerns them. What concerns the political establishment is to preserve the coalition [government]."

Still, he worries that Israel can ill afford "a world war with the Reform and Conservative movement and the major Jewish organizations."

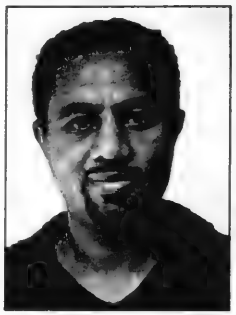
Policy on non-Jewish refugees urged for Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Israeli government should enact a formal policy for non-Jewish asylum seekers in Israel, says the founder and director of a refugee centre in Tel Aviv.

"Israel needs a policy that protects these refugees," said Yohannes Bayu of the African Refugee Development Center. "Israel must deal with this situation sooner rather than later."



Yohannes Bayu

Here recently as the guest of the New Israel Fund to create awareness about the issue, Bayu said the absence of a such a policy makes it difficult for refugees to receive proper care, humanitarian aid and residency.

Bayu – a 38-year-old Ethiopian Christian from Addis Ababa who was granted political asylum in 1997 after a 23-day hunger strike – estimates there are close to 20,000 asylum seekers in Israel, mainly from the African countries of Sudan and Eritrea.

"They have no rights, can't legally work and are not eligible for welfare," said Bayu, a temporary resident who hopes to become an Israeli citizen.

By his estimate, most of the asylum seekers are single, range in age from 25 to 35, are well educated and have been in Israel since 2006.

And the majority have fled political persecution, he added.

"It's very hard for them to manage," he said in a telephone interview before an appearance at Temple Emanu-El in Toronto late last month. "They are suffering."

In his view, Israel should pass legislation that would provide the refugees with their basic needs – housing and medical assistance – and allow them to look for employment.

"This population can support itself if given the chance to find jobs," he said. "This would solve a lot of problems."

Robert Walker, director of communications at Israel's embassy in Ottawa, noted that Israel is aware of the problem.

In a statement, he said: "Israel understands the pain of African asylum seekers, and is committed to finding a reasonable solution. On the one hand, Israel recognizes the suffering of those seeking refuge, but at the same time, Israel's concerns cannot be ignored.

"Israel is a very small country, and the cost of thousands of refugees places a significant strain in terms of security, socio-economic costs, and the Jewish and democratic nature of the state. Prime Minister [Benjamin] Netanyahu has made it clear that Israel remains open for war refugees, but it cannot allow thousands of illegal immigrants to infiltrate the country."

According to a recent report in Ha'aretz, Israel's foreign ministry has launched a campaign to justify Israel's policy of expelling refugees from the province of Darfur in Sudan.

In a defence of this policy, the ministry claims that Al Qaeda terrorists might try to enter Israel as refugees.

Bayu's organization, with an annual budget of about $300,000 (US), has given more than 4,500 African refugees shelter, food, medical attention, trauma counselling and lessons in Hebrew and English since its establishment in 2004.

He has received grants from the United Nations and from Israeli non-governmental organizations, primarily the New Israel Fund.

Living in Jerusalem but based in Tel Aviv, he directs a staff of nine workers and some 120 volunteers.

Bayu has personally taken his case to the Knesset and politicians and has worked closely with the Israeli media.

In 2008, he was nominated person of the year by the Israeli newspaper Yediot Achronot.

"Most Israelis are sympathetic," he observed, "but the [Israeli] government does not have a good attitude toward refugees."

Bayu says he left Ethiopia – which has good ties with Israel – in fear of his life after working for a non-governmental organization pressing for democracy.

Monitored, harassed and twice imprisoned by the Ethiopian government without formal charges being laid against him, he was tortured while in jail.

"There is no judicial process or rule of law in Ethiopia," he said. "The government does what it wants. It was not safe for me to remain in Ethiopia. People I know have disappeared."

Asked why he chose Israel as a haven, he replied, "Israel is a democratic country and experienced in accepting refugees. It's a place where I feel safe."

Kingston fraternity comes of age

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Kingston's Alpha Epsilon Pi colony, a Jewish fraternity, officially became a chapter last week. The group supports Jewish students on campus.

Kingston's chapter of Alpha Epsilon Pi [AEPi] has become a man. Metaphorically speaking.

On March 15, at a charter ceremony, the Jewish fraternity recognized Kingston's AEPi colony, which is located at Queen's University and incorporates St. Lawrence College and Royal Military College, as an official chapter of the international organization.

Kingston's fraternity, called Kappa Phi, was originally started in 2006 as a colony, the first step toward becoming an AEPi chapter, with some 10 founding members. This year, the group, which supports Jewish events and life on campus, will have about 43 members.

"[The charter ceremony] is akin to a bar mitzvah," said Andrew Borans, the executive director of AEPi International. "It's a coming of age… they're stable. They're no longer having their hands held by [the international organization]."

In order to become a full-fledged chapter, each colony must prove it's sustainable and that it's involved in social, athletic, philanthropic and Jewish/Israel programming on campus.

"We provide [guidance] to all colonies, but this particular one has been very good… they have excellent leadership, excellent commitment to wanting to do the right thing, to wanting to be strong on campus," Borans said. "I believe Jewish kids are now coming to Queen's University because they know there's a strong AEPi there."

As an official chapter, Kingston's AEPi will be allowed to vote on international issues and will have more independence in its day-to-day operations.

When the AEPi colony was originally established in Kingston, Jewish presence on campus wasn't very strong. This, according to Borans, could have acted as a deterrent for prospective students.

"The issue is that sometimes Jewish families feel that if Jewish life is weak, it won't be a good experience for their son or daughter," he said. "Now [students] can have a chance to socialize. I see [the fraternity] becoming much stronger because now, after being chartered, they will grow considerably and more Jews will come to Queen's."

David Warshafsky, a first-year commerce student at Queen's and AEPi's charter chair, saw this first-hand when his older brother considered going to Queen's.

"My brother, he had friends who wanted to come to Queen's, but there [was] no Jewish community out here. My cousin wanted to come, but his parents wanted him to go to [the University of Western Ontario]," Warshafsky said, adding that the fraternity has helped lure Jewish students to Kingston.

"The [Jewish] community's gotten a lot bigger. I've spoken to people in Grade 12 who now seem more interested to come to Queen's. The frat helped because… it gives [Jewish students] a comfort level."

The fraternity's goal is to foster a sense of community and Jewish values through social and philanthropic events such as barbecues, rush football games and initiatives such as selling roses on Valentine's Day for charity.

While the group has partnered with Hillel in the past for various events, it also offers Jewish students an alternative to Hillel, said Daniel Zimmerman, the chapter's president.

"[AEPi] presents another face of the Jewish community in Kingston. A lot of people that go to Hillel are from Toronto, from specific schools. There's kind of a Hillel crowd," Zimmerman said. "AEPi is a little more diverse. It helps… people who might feel uncomfortable going to Hillel because they're not in that crowd."

For Borans, having a group like AEPi is essential in cities with smaller Jewish populations.

"It's a lot more important than in a place that has thousands and thousands of Jewish kids," he said. "In smaller places, there's very few Jewish outlets. We're a major… reason why Jewish kids feel comfortable at Queen's."

York tribunal to determine Hossain's fate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A tribunal is set to convene this week to determine Salman Hossain's future at York University.

The three-person board, which will include representatives of student, staff and faculty, will hold a closed-door hearing to determine whether Hossain has violated the university's Student Code of Conduct, said York spokesperson Keith Marnoch.

Hossain's alleged postings on his website, filthyJewishterrorists.com, could form part of the evidence heard by the tribunal, Marnoch added.

The website, which was no longer operating late last week, called for the murder of Jews and described terrorism as "A Jewish Passover Celebration." Police are investigating whether Hossain breached the Criminal Codes's provisions against promoting hate or advocating genocide.

Marnoch said Hossain was suspended last week "for being unco-operative with the [disciplinary] process."

After ignoring phone message and e-mails, Hossain was finally contacted by York's dispute resolution office and the hearing was scheduled, Marnoch said.

He remains suspended pending a determination by the tribunal.

Canadian Jewish Congress called the case "black and white" and said Hossain should be expelled.

"The question I put to the tribunal is that when you have a student who advocates mass murder of fellow Jewish students, should that not be remedied with his expulsion from the university?" asked Congress CEO Bernie Farber. "It would seem the rational and logical answer is yes."

PASSOVER FOOD IDEAS

Substitutions for the holiday

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

At some point during Pesach preparations, we've all tried to convert a mainstream recipe into a Pesach one, only to discover that we don't have a clue as to what to substitute for a chametz ingredient. This is why I started compiling my list of Passover substitutes. I've added some great new substitutions this year. If anyone has any other substitutions that they would like to share, please let me know at ztlog@verizon.net.

1 oz. baking chocolate (unsweetened chocolate) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1 tbsp. oil or melted margarine

16 oz. semi-sweet chocolate = 6 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1/4 cup oil and 7 tbsp. granulated sugar

14 oz. sweet chocolate (German-type) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 2-2/3 tbsp. oil and 4-1/2 tbsp. granulated sugar

1 cup confectioners' sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar minus 1 tbsp. sugar plus 1 tbsp. potato starch pulsed in a food processor or blender

1 cup sour milk or buttermilk for dairy baking = 1 tbsp. lemon juice in a 1 cup measure, then fill to 1 cup with Passover nondairy creamer or milk. Stir and steep 5 minutes butter in baking or cooking – use pareve Passover margarine in equal amounts. Use a bit less salt.

1 cup honey = 1-1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/4 cup water

1 cup corn syrup = 1-1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/3 cup water, boiled until syrupy

1 cup vanilla sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar with 1 split vanilla bean left for at least 24 hours in a tightly covered jar

1 cup of flour – substitute 5/8 cup matzah cake meal or potato starch, or a combination sifted together

1 tbsp. flour = 1/2 tbsp. potato starch

1 cup corn starch = 7/8 cup potato starch

1 tsp. cream of tartar = 1-1/2 tsp. lemon juice or 1-1/2 tsp. vinegar

1 cup graham cracker crumbs = 1 cup ground cookies or soup nuts plus 1 tsp. cinnamon

1 cup bread crumbs = 1 cup matzah meal

1 cup matzah meal = 3 matzahs ground in a food processor

1 cup matzah cake meal = 1 cup plus 2 tbsp. matzah meal finely ground in a blender or food processor and sifted

3 crumbled matzahs = 2 cups matzah farfel

1 cup cream cheese = 1 cup cottage cheese pureed with 1/2 stick butter or margarine

chicken fat or gribenes = 2 caramelized onions. Saute 2 sliced onions in 2 tbsp. oil and 2 tbsp. sugar. Cook until the onions are soft. Puree the onions once they are golden.

1 cup milk (for baking) = 1 cup water plus 2 tbsp. margarine, or 1/2 cup fruit juice plus 1/2 cup water

1 1/4 cups sweetened condensed milk =1 cup instant nonfat dry milk, 2/3 cup sugar, 1/3 cup boiling water and 3 tbsp. margarine. Blend all the ingredients until smooth. To thicken, let set in the refrigerator for 24 hours.

1 cup wine= 13 tbsp. water, 3 tablespoons lemon juice and 1 tbsp. sugar. Mix together and let set for 10 minutes.

for frying: instead of chicken fat, use combination of olive oil or vegetable oil and 1 to 2 tbsp. pareve Passover margarine.

eggs: Passover egg substitutes don't work quite as well as the chametz egg substitutes. For kugels, matzah balls, fried matzah and some cakes, the recipes will probably be OK. However, if you want to avoid them (and I do) you can add one extra egg white and 1/2 tsp. of vegetable oil for each yolk eliminated when baking. Use only egg whites as the dipping to coat and fry meats.

Italian Seasoning = 1/4 tsp. each dried oregano leaves, dried marjoram leaves and dried basil leaves plus 1/8 tsp. rubbed dried sage. This can be substituted for 1-1/2 tsp. Italian seasoning.

curry powder = 2 tbsp. ground coriander, 1 tbsp. black pepper, 2 tbsp. red pepper, 2 tbsp. turmeric, 2 tbsp. ground ginger. Makes 2/3 cup.

pancake syrup = use fruit jelly, not jam, and add a little water to thin. I always like to combine the jelly and water in a microwave-safe bowl and heat it gently before I serve it.

seasoned rice wine vinegar = 3 tbsp. white vinegar, 1 tbsp. white wine, 1 tbsp. sugar, 1/2 tsp. salt. Mix to combine. Makes 1/4 cup vinegar = lemon juice in cooking or salad, grapefruit juice in salads, wine in marinades.

water chestnuts – substitute raw jicama orange liqueur – substitute an equal amount of frozen orange juice concentrate

SOY SAUCE SUBSTITUTE

This soy sauce substitute doesn't taste exactly like the real thing, but it makes a flavourful alternative for Pesach stir fry.

2 tbsp. beef broth
1 tbsp. red wine vinegar
1 tsp. balsamic vinegar
1 tbsp. brown sugar
1 tsp. oil
1/8 tsp. garlic powder
black pepper to taste
1/4 cup boiling water

Combine all the ingredients. At this point, you can either use the sauce as is, leaving for an hour to give the flavours a chance to blend; or, for a thicker, richer sauce, boil the liquid until it is reduced by half, to about 3 tbsp. Store in a sealed container in the refrigerator. Makes 2/3 cup. Use the sauce within 3 to 4 days.

Three chocolate desserts and a macaron

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

Last year, I developed a Passover dessert story for The CJN titled "Three chocolates and a macaroon." Well, this year, I've revisited the theme but changed it, as you can see, to "Three chocolate desserts and a macaron." Did I simply omit an "o," hoping for a new angle on desserts or a reader's faulty memory? Heavens, no!

Macarons, those dainty French (flourless) cookies are now all the rage, appearing in patisseries in France, in New York, and even on dessert menus in restaurants. And the best thing is that they're perfectly easy to make at home. Less dense and more airy than a traditional coconut-based macaroon, macarons are typically made with ground almonds and piped about the size of a large walnut. They keep well in an airtight container at room temperature and can be an array of rainbow colours – you get to choose.

And chocolate, well, what can I say? Who doesn't love chocolate? The Chocolate Sorbet is smooth, delectable and rich, with nary a tablespoon of cream in sight. The Chocolate Cashew Toffee is incredibly rich and decadent with the saltiness of the cashews cutting some of the richness and making it sinfully addictive. Lastly, the Individual Chocolate Almond Cakes beg to be served with a rich jewel like raspberry puree piped decoratively around each guest's plate, perhaps with a dusting of cocoa as well.

CHOCOLATE SORBET

1 cup granulated sugar
2 cups water
12 oz. high quality bittersweet chocolate, finely chopped
3 egg yolks, lightly beaten.
1 tsp. vanilla

In saucepan set over medium heat, whisk together sugar and 2 cups water, until sugar is completely dissolved. Whisk in chocolate until melted and smooth.

Very gradually and whisking constantly, whisk chocolate mixture into egg yolks. Return to saucepan. Using wooden spoon, stir until custard thickens slightly and leaves a path on the back of spoon when a finger is drawn across it. Be careful not to boil the mixture. Transfer to bowl. Stir in vanilla. Cover with plastic wrap. Refrigerate for about 2 hours or until completely chilled.

Process sorbet in ice cream machine according to manufacturer's instructions. Spoon sorbet into freezable container; freeze until firm or for up to 3 days. Makes 6 servings.

CHOCOLATE CASHEW TOFFEE

1 lb. unsalted butter or hard margarine
2 cups granulated sugar
1/4 tsp. salt
3 cups salted cashews, whole or pieces
8 oz. bittersweet chocolate, finely chopped

Lightly grease a large baking pan; set aside on large hot plate or wire rack.

In 6-quart heavy bottomed saucepan, bring butter and sugar to boil over medium-high heat, whisking until smooth. Boil, stirring occasionally, for 15 to 20 minutes or until mixture is a deep golden colour and candy thermometer reads 300F (hard ball stage). Immediately stir in cashews and pour mixture onto prepared pan. Spread evenly with spatula; sprinkle chocolate immediately over top.

Let stand for 1 minute to allow chocolate to melt; spread until evenly covered. Freeze until firm. Break into coarsely sized pieces. Toffee can be stored in an airtight container at room temperature for up to 10 days. Makes about 3 pounds.

FRENCH ALMOND MACARONS

6 oz. blanched whole almonds (about 2 cups)
1 cup granulated sugar
1 tbsp. potato starch
4 egg whites
pinch salt
4-5 drops red or green food colouring
4 oz. bittersweet chocolate, melted

Line two large baking sheets with parchment paper and set aside. In bowl of food processor fitted with metal blade, process together almonds, 1/4 cup of the sugar and the potato starch until nuts are very finely ground. Transfer to bowl; stir in 1/4 cup sugar.

In bowl of electric mixer, beat egg whites with pinch of salt until soft peaks form. With machine running, gradually add remaining 1/4 cup sugar, beat until glossy stiff peaks are formed. Fold in food colouring until desired colour is achieved. Fold in almond mixture.

Sweet ending to the seder meal

Transfer mixture to piping bag with 1/4-in. opening. Pipe peaked mounds of batter onto prepared baking sheets, roughly the size of kisses, spacing about 1-1/2 in. apart. Let stand at room temperature for 30 minutes or until a light crust is formed on the surface of the macarons.

Bake in preheated oven at 300 for 25 minutes, switching pans from top to bottom halfway through baking, until crisp. Cool completely on pans on racks.

Spread melted chocolate on underside of half of the macarons. Sandwich with remaining macarons. Will keep in airtight container at room temperature for up to 5 days. Makes 2-1/2 dozen macarons.

INDIVIDUAL CHOCOLATE ALMOND CAKES

2 oz. almond paste (not marzipan which will have wheat in it))
1/4 cup granulated sugar
1/2 cup unsalted butter or hard margarine, softened
6 eggs
3 tbsp. fine matzah cake meal
pinch salt

Chocolate Batter
12 oz. high quality bittersweet chocolate, finely chopped
1/3 cup granulated sugar

Grease eight 4-oz. ramekins and place on baking sheet; set aside.

Chocolate Batter: In top of double boiler set over hot – not boiling – water, melt together chocolate and sugar, stirring until smooth.

Meanwhile, break almond paste into small pieces into bowl of food processor fitted with steel blade. Add sugar; pulse until mixture looks quite grainy. Add butter; pulse until mixture is homogenous. Add eggs, cake meal and salt; pulse until combined, stopping to scrape down sides occasionally. Scrape chocolate mixture into processor. Pulse until mixture is combined and there are no streaks.

Divide batter evenly among prepared ramekins. Bake in centre of preheated 350 oven for 40 to 45 minutes or until top of cake springs back when lightly pressed and cake tester comes out with a few moist crumbs clinging to it. Cool for 15 minutes. Run small paring knife around edge of ramekins to loosen cakes. Turn out onto individual plates to cool completely before serving. (Cakes can be made up to 1 day ahead and stored, well covered, at room temperature). Makes 8 servings.

HEALTHY NEVER TASTED SO GOOD

Add variety with the versatile eggplant

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Eggplant can add a sophisticated flavour to dishes, and its exotic taste and texture lends itself to preparation in a variety of different ways. Eggplant is wonderful in salads, soups, main courses, casseroles and side dishes and can be roasted, sautéed, grilled or baked.

A medium size eggplant will weigh around one pound and provides 4 cups of chopped eggplant. A 1-pound eggplant yields about 1-3/4 cups cooked puree and will serve 3 people.

EGGPLANT LASAGNA

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 medium onion, chopped
2 cloves garlic minced
1 large eggplant, washed and cut into 3/4-inch cubes
2 cups sliced mushrooms
1 16-oz. can tomato sauce
1 16-oz. can tomatoes, with liquid
1 tsp. oregano
1 tsp. basil
1/2 tsp. black pepper
1/8 tsp. crushed red pepper flakes
2 cups shredded mozzarella
1 cup cottage cheese (or more)
1/4 cup chopped parsley
6 matzah
3/4 cup grated parmesan cheese

In a large saucepan, saute the onion and garlic in the olive oil until onion is softened. Add the eggplant, mushrooms, tomato sauce, tomatoes, oregano, basil pepper and red pepper. Cover and cook over medium heat for 15 minutes. Uncover and cook 25 minutes more. In another bowl, combine the cottage cheese, mozzarella and parsley. Rinse the matzah under cold water and let sit on paper towels for 5 minutes. Preheat oven to 350.

Lightly grease a 9 x 13-in. pan. Layer 2 slices of matzah on the bottom of the dish. Cover with 1/3 of the cheese mixture, 1/4 cup Parmesan, and then eggplant sauce. Repeat 3 times, with the last layer to be the parmesan cheese. Bake uncovered for 30 minutes until heated through. Serves 8.

HONEY GLAZED ROASTED VEGETABLE MEDLY

1/4 cup honey
1/4 cup olive oil
3 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
1 tsp. minced garlic
salt and pepper
1 tsp. dried thyme, or more to taste
8 to 10 red quartered red potatoes,
3 to 4 sliced zucchini,
2 thickly sliced onions,
2 red peppers cut into chunks
4 carrots cut into chunks
1 large sweet potato cut into chunks
1 eggplant peeled and cut into 2-in. cubes, salted, placed in colander 20 minutes, rinsed in cold water

Preheat oven to 400. In a bowl, combine the honey, olive oil, balsamic vinegar, crushed garlic and thyme and mix to combine. Grease a roasting pan and in it combine the potatoes, zucchini, onions, red peppers, carrots, sweet potatoes and eggplant. Drizzle the honey mixture over the vegetables and then mix to make sure everything is coated. Season with salt and pepper. Bake for 30 to 35 minutes stirring every 10 minutes making sure nothing gets too burnt. Serves 8.

For your vegetarian guests

CHEESY EGGPLANT ROLLS

1 large eggplant, cut into 10 thin slices, salted, placed in colander 20 minutes, rinsed in cold water
10 slices smoked mozzarella
3 to 4 plum tomatoes cut into 10 thick slices
3 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
1 tbsp. dried oregano
balsamic vinegar and olive oil, for drizzling (optional)
marinara or tomato sauce, warmed

Preheat a grill pan to a medium heat. Brush liberally with oil. Pat dry eggplant with paper towels. Grill eggplant slices 8-10 minutes, turning once after 5 minutes. Remove the slices from grill pan to a plate. Place a mozzarella slice in centre of each slice. Top with a tomato slice and sprinkle with parsley and a little oregano. Roll up the eggplant slice and secure with a toothpick. Place the roll back on grill pan, seam side down. Heat until mozzarella begins to melt. Remove from the grill pan to your serving platter. Drizzle with balsamic vinegar. Serve hot with marinara sauce. Makes 10.

Fish recipe passed down through the generations

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Many traditional family recipes handed down orally from one generation to the next disappear because the recipes were never written down.

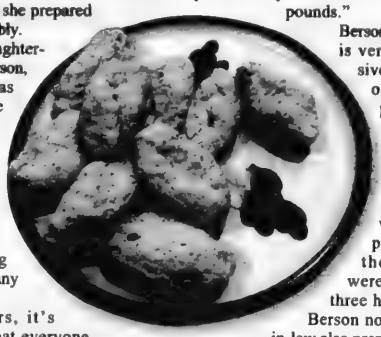
Joan Weinberg's family decided her gefilte fish recipe was too precious to lose. In recent years, the two younger generations have dedicated time and effort to perpetuating Weinberg's culinary legacy.

Although she was born in Warsaw, Weinberg had never heard of gefilte fish until she came to Canada. She and her mother, Elizabeth Ramet, arrived in 1949, after spending the war years in Russia.

"My mother started making gefilte fish in Toronto to please my husband," Weinberg recalls, explaining that the late Sydney Weinberg was from Opatow, a town in Poland where people ate a sweet gefilte fish.

Ramet kept all her recipes in a little notebook that survives today. But the 60-year-old tattered book now has more sentimental than practical value because Weinberg cooks from memory. "When I learned to cook, there were no measurements."

She says she improved on the original gefilte fish recipe her mother gave her, but she never wrote anything down. After 60 years of making this traditional dish, she knows it by heart. When her children married and had children, the amount of fish she prepared increased considerably.



Weinberg's daughter-in-law, Barbara Berson, says the family was aware that the recipe was not written down.

"We used to tease my mother-in-law about getting her gefilte fish recipe. We talked about learning to make the fish many times.

"At our seders, it's the special dish that everyone enjoys. We knew it was a lot of work," Berson says.

Two years ago, Berson and her daughter, Leah Weinberg, 14, offered to help make the fish.

"I had the time and Leah was old enough to help.

"As we were preparing the fish, I scribbled down the recipe. Mine is for five pounds. My mother-in-law makes eight pounds."

Berson says gefilte fish is very labour intensive. "There's a lot of chopping and peeling."

She says it would take her mother-in-law all day to make the fish, but with two extra pairs of hands, the fish patties were made in about three hours. However, Berson notes her mother-in-law also prepared the fish the night before and there was an additional two hours of cooking to be done after she and Leah left.

The following Passover, Leah and her cousins Ariel, 14, and Rebecca Weinberg, 11, helped their grandmother make the gefilte fish.

Leah even documented the experience with photographs and turned the fish-making into a slide show for her graduation project at the Downtown Jewish Community School. Mixing the fish and chopping the vegetables is hard work, but with her cousins around to share the pain, there was a party atmosphere, she says. "We were laughing a lot."

Her hands didn't smell very good after she had formed her share of the 65 patties. "I had to wash them twice to get the smell off."

Berson says the traditional foods are an important connection to being Jewish. "I feel that learning to make gefilte fish is one of the great ways of carrying on a family tradition and honouring my mother-in-law."

BUBBIE JOAN'S GEFILTE FISH

5 lb. ground fish (mostly whitefish, with a little pike and pickerel, plus the bones or 10 lb. (5 kg) whole fish
5 eggs, lightly beaten
1/2 cup matzah meal
4 medium cooking onions, sliced
1 Spanish onion cut in chunks
5 carrots, peeled
5 tbsp. sugar, plus extra to taste
5 tsp. salt
2 tsp. pepper
additional salt and pepper to taste

The night before, place ground fish in a large bowl and add some of the salt, pepper and sugar. Mix gently. Place bones and head in a separate bowl and add some of the salt, pepper and sugar. Cover both bowls loosely and refrigerate overnight.

To prepare cooking broth, distribute carrots and sliced onions equally in three large pots and add water to cover vegetables. Add remaining salt, pepper and sugar to taste, divided into each pot, and bring to a boil. Distribute bones and heads to each pot. Bring to a boil and then reduce heat to simmer.

While bones are simmering, prepare ground fish. Add matzah meal, salt, pepper and sugar to taste and mix gently.

Grind Spanish onion in a food processor. Add beaten eggs. Add onion/egg mixture to fish and mix well.

Prepare a small bowl of cold water. Form the fish into small patties the size of your palm, wetting your hands frequently to keep fish from sticking to them. Place patties into the pots of simmering broth and continue simmering for two hours. The broth should show the occasional bubble.

Remove fish with a slotted spoon. Place on serving platter(s). Cover loosely and refrigerate.

Strain the bones and vegetables from the fish broth and refrigerate the broth. Save carrots and slice into thin rounds. Garnish individual portions with carrot rounds and serve with chilled broth. Makes approximately 50 pieces.

Cooking ideas from Israel

BY JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Ask two Jews a question and you'll get three opinions. Controversy, controversy. In politics you expect it, but it's true even in cooking.

Take the much maligned, yet oh so beloved Jewish appetizer that graces every holiday table, from the weekly celebration of the Sabbath to Passover: gefilte fish.

In the Middle Ages, Jewish mystics viewed fish as signaling the coming of the Messiah. No wonder it is served for every holiday! Fish was expensive in Europe, and the gefilte fish recipes were developed as an economical way to stretch it so that every family member could get a taste.

But wherein lies the controversy? Do we open a jar or make it ourselves? Or "doctor" the jarred variety? Do we like it sweet or peppery? With some guests adoring it and others repelled at the very sight, do we even serve it at all?

As Passover approaches, Jewish cooks the world over plan a festive repast. Traditionalists wouldn't dream of celebrating the holiday without treasured family recipes. For eager innovators, the holiday cries out for some enticing new way to honour the ancient symbols.

This year I'm skipping the gefilte fish drama and going with Moroccan-Style Hot Fish, a recipe I found in a beautiful cookbook by Janna Gur, the founder and editor of Al Hashulchan (On the Table), a leading Israeli food and wine magazine.

The Book of New Israeli Food: A Culinary Journey (Schocken Books) is at once a cookbook, a beautifully photographed coffee table book and a fascinating culinary history lesson on the diverse cuisine of Israel.

For dessert, Balkan Jews customarily serve a rich, savoury pastry at every important meal, a tradition that led to the creation of the Passover mina, Gur noted. Matzot become the crust of this Passover pie.

"Baking delicious cakes without flour is a challenge," she writes. Gur's Flourless Chocolate and Pistachio Cake combines almonds and pistachio nuts with chocolate for crunch and flavour.

The following recipes are adapted from The Book of New Israeli Food.

MOROCCAN-STYLE HOT FISH

1/2 cup olive oil
10 whole garlic cloves, peeled
2 coarsely chopped sweet red peppers
2 hot red peppers halved and seeded
1 cup coriander (cilantro), coarsely chopped
1 cup parsley, coarsely chopped
2 tbsp. Moroccan paprika (you can use any kosher paprika, but it is not as hot)
salt to taste
6 portion-sized steaks (with the bone) of grouper, halibut or other firm fleshed saltwater fish
1 lemon, sliced for serving

Heat the oil in a large, wide pan and sauté the garlic and both kind of peppers for 2 minutes. Add herbs, paprika and salt and sauté for a couple more minutes, stirring occasionally. Pour in 2 cups of water and bring to a simmer. Taste and adjust seasoning (once you add the fish it will be difficult to stir the sauce and play with flavours).

Carefully add the fish chunks (ideally in a single layer), cover and simmer gently for about 25 minutes until the fish is done and the sauce thickens. Serve with lemon wedges.

Variation: The dish can also be prepared with boneless fillets. In this case, the sauce should be cooked without the fish, and when ready (thick, spicy and delicious), fillets should added and cooked in the sauce for 8-10 minutes. Yield: 8 servings.

MINA DEL PESACH
Passover matzah pie

Crust:
8 to 10 matzahs
olive oil, for brushing
Filling:
1/4 cup oil
2 to 3 onions, chopped finely
3 cloves garlic, crushed
1 1/2 lb. ground beef or lamb salt and coarsely ground black pepper
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
4 eggs
2 to 3 tbsp. matzah meal
1 to 2 potatoes, cooked and mashed
1/2 cup pine nuts, roasted
1/2 cup fresh parsley, chopped (optional)
3/4 cup chicken stock

Dip matzahs in cold water for a few seconds, wrap in a towel and leave 10 to 15 minutes until soft and flexible.

Fry onions in oil until golden. Add garlic and meat and continue frying until meat is done. Add spices, remove from heat, cool slightly and add eggs, matzah meal, mashed potatoes, pine nuts and parsley. Mix well.

Preheat oven to 350. Grease 12-in. round baking dish. Brush wet matzahs on both sides lightly with oil and arrange on bottom, draping enough over sides to later cover filling.

Spoon half the meat mixture into baking dish and flatten. Cover with a layer of matzahs and top with remaining half of meat. Fold matzah draped over side of dish to cover filling, brush with oil, place additional matzah on top and brush with oil.

Bake 25 to 30 minutes or until golden. Remove from oven, spoon stock over pie and return to oven for another 5 minutes. Cool slightly and serve.

Breathe in the atmosphere shopping at Machane Yehuda

By SYBIL KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

Jaffa Road was considered Jerusalem's main thoroughfare, so named because it was the beginning of the highway that led to the port of Jaffa on the Mediterranean Sea. Jaffa Road was also the first street built outside the Old City walls in what is today called the New City.

Until 1860, almost no one in Jerusalem lived outside the Old City, an area encircled by a 2-1/2-mile wall rebuilt in the 1530s. Gradually, in the late 1860s and 1870s, a small portion of the Jewish community moved outside the wall.

One of the early areas settled off Jaffa Road between 1875 and 1900 was Machane Yehuda. Jews who had come primarily from Muslim Arab countries of the Middle East and North Africa set up shops and stalls to serve this area where they lived. Although neighbourhoods have extended in all directions and people moved away, throughout the years, many have continued to come here to do their weekly shopping because it's a Jewish market.

The shuk (market), located between downtown and the central bus station, can be identified by its many bus stops, congested traffic and abundance of all kinds of people.

All of one's senses are expanded when one walks through Machane Yehuda because there are a multitude of things to hear, see and smell. Shopping in the large market for many, like Barry and me, is a weekly (or multi-times-a-week) ritual. People with all levels of education and income shop here because of its unique atmosphere. One can see the warm, earthy roughness of people as basic, free human beings. People who shop here also do so because the prices are lower, the quality is better, the variety is greater.

The sellers are mostly Sephardim from Middle Eastern backgrounds. They are clever, tough, abrupt and direct. They appear poor, but this is a deception: they are mostly well to do. They are also rich in emotions. It is not uncommon to walk through Etz Chayim Street, the original covered walkway and find vendors singing their wares.

All of the paths between Etz Chayim and Machane Yehuda Street, the uncovered walkway, are named. Going from Agrippas Street, the boundary on one side to Jaffa Road, the boundary on the other side, they include: Ha'tut (the berry), Ha'egoz (the nut), Ha'shaked (the almond), Banai (perhaps named after an Israeli performer, actor, singer who grew up in Machane Yehuda), Ha'tapuach (the apple). Off of Machaneh Yehudah Street are two other paths, Ha'eskhol (the cluster) and Pri ha'etz (fruit of the tree).

We buy a lot of our fruit and vegetables from 24-year-old Ron, who got married in August. He is the youngest of three brothers who run the Yaniv Aminiv booth, along with two others who he feels are like brothers. The booth is located on the corner of Iraqi Market Street, next to the Azura restaurant.

When I first started shopping at his booth, I was struck by his friendly, sweet personality. He has worked for 15 years in the booth his Israeli-born father started 30 years ago. Why here? Because his grandfather came from Iraq.

The high-quality fruits and vegetables, grown in hothouses, come from the farm his father manages on Moshav Sharsheret, near Netivot in the northern Negev. What they don't grow, they buy in a market in Givat Shaul.

In addition to selling to the regular customers, Aminiv sells to the Azura restaurant and to several other restaurants.

Standing in the booth for just a few minutes, you can easily see how busy it is and how many people pay a little more for higher quality.

A few months ago, I was doing a story on 33-year-old Tali Friedman, house chef for Teamim, the Machane Yehuda Shuk Canyon Cooking School at Agrippas 88, and afterward, she took me on her tour of the shuk.

Now she does culinary tours where they collect food and go back to class and cook together.

Friedman also built a special course for Young Judaeans on the year course of the Zionist youth movement sponsored by Hadassah Women's Zionist Organization of America.

In the fall, she opened a studio on Machane Yehuda Street, where she does her culinary tours with people who buy in the market and cook in her big studio kitchen where she gives lessons.

On the little side paths around Etz Chayim Street, Friedman took me to meet Mr. Beladi, who sells me vegetables, and Nissim, who works at Atleez Mizrach with his father, Yaacov, carving beautiful meat and poultry. Nissim speaks great English, and I contributed to his store a picture of a cow with the cuts of meat in English.

On another path is Shlomo Dagim (Shlomo Fish), where I buy fresh and frozen fish. A sign hangs there with the names of the fish in Hebrew and English.

On Etz Chayim Street, we buy our cheeses, olives, preserved fish and a few other things from Abu Daoud v'Banav, a store established in 1936 and owned by 11 brothers. Shmuel, a smiling friendly man in his 50s or 60s, helps us and teaches me about the different cheeses.

I would be remiss if I didn't mention Shimon and Orah, the lovely older couple who own Shimon Eliyahu, also on Etz Chayim Street, who sell nuts, dry fruit, candies, condiments, oils, extracts, spices, canned goods and more. When I had a persistent cough and nothing the doctors gave me would help, he sold me menthol cough drops and the cough left immediately.

On Machane Yehuda Street is Makolet Naaman, run by friendly young fellows who sell me all kinds of dairy products as well as some groceries.

At the corner of Machane Yehuda and Haeshkol Street is a large bakery, Ugat Chen (beautiful cakes). Menachem has been in the shuk for 53 years, and his dark and white rolls, as well as his freshly made pita bread, have turned us into frequent buyers.

The biggest changes in the market are the myriad of boutiques selling clothes, giftware and Judaica, and restaurants tucked among the booths and stores. Azura is strictly Iraqi and Middle Eastern and the food is cooked on p'tilioht, portable, single-burner kerosene cookers. Emil offers dairy food, coffee, sandwiches and pastry. Ochim Bashuk specializes in Persian food. Mizrachi is also dairy, with salads, egg dishes, coffee, pastry and house specialties.

No matter how many things are on my list, I always find more to buy as Barry and I inspect the wares at the stands and load up our wheeled cart. We brought two fold-up carts and are now on the second one!

If you want to have an enriching experience with us, you need to wear comfortable shoes, carry a lot of small change in a coin purse and bring various shaped shopping bags. To act like a seasoned shopper, you have to keep your eyes on the stands, produce and prices – not on the direction you are walking in. Seasoned shoppers also ignore people who bump into them or fall over your bags when you lay them down. You have to absorb yourself totally in choosing, purchasing and paying. You can, of course, question the seller about the price in case he decides to lower it because he likes your looks, and this does happen to me.

Most important – you have to breathe in the atmosphere.

Helping Grandma with the seder

By BEVERLY LEVITT
Special to The CJN

Everybody loves Passover. Partly, it's because every year we get to hear the same story told differently. Of course, that's because we all get to put in our two cents. And that's what the holiday is really about.

We fight over who will host the Passover seder, but whoever wins, everyone pitches in with the cooking, making sure the Passover plate is appropriately filled, the multi-course table properly set.

Although my father, Milton, 92, is still the official patriarch of the family he shares leading the service with my brother Dennis, with me egging both of them on. And the father and son patriarchs share responsibility for hiding the afikomen and rewarding the lucky child who finds it.

Last year, to all of our shock, after they had so cleverly hidden the cloth-covered matzah in the most remote place they could think of, it took about three seconds for my one-year-old granddaughter, Addie, who had just started walking, to shock us when she calmly walked into the dining room clutching the special prize.

As we retell the story of the first Passover, using our best Hollywood voices, we are often moved to tears at the horrors endured under Pharaoh. As with any good story, we are lightened by the happy ending and the unique way we obtained our freedom.

What we look forward to the most is making the charoset sandwich – mixing the sweet fruit and nuts with the bitter horseradish and piling it between two pieces of matzah to symbolize the bitterness of slavery and the sweetness of freedom. The trick is to put just the right amount of charoset on the horseradish or we are struck breathless and giant tears overwhelm us.

From the time my older granddaughter, Tiara, made her first "sandwich" – she wanted "as much as the big people," even though I cautioned her to look at the other end of the table at her cousin Joey, who was coughing and choking. He thinks he's impervious to Mama Celia's horseradish.

When we are finally finished taking the trip through the Red Sea and out of Egypt and singing about freedom and the joys of spring, all of us matriarchs hurry to the kitchen to serve up the best meal of the year.

Although my mother, Celia, is, hands down, the best Jewish cook in the family, at 92, the labour intensive meal is overwhelming. This year, I asked her, of all the recipes she used to make, which ones she would like me to do for her.

Without a blink she said, "Potato kugel – one dish I have yet to conquer."

Then my dad piped in, "What about your brisket 'n' tzimmes?"

So, I am elected to fulfil those parental commandments, and Dennis' two sons, Joseph and Daniel, will be making their grandma's horseradish. Under her supervision. I can hardly wait!

CELIA LEVITT'S BRISKET AND CARROT TZIMMES

According to Jewish cookbook author Joan Nathan, tzimmes is not only a beloved Ashkenazi dish, in Yiddish it means a "mix-up," an "affair blown out of proportion." So, enjoy this dish, but don't make such a tzimmes out of it.

This is actually a side dish. Roasted brisket and chicken are the main events.

1 lb. brisket, with a small amount of fat left on
2 onions, sliced
5 cloves garlic, chopped
2 sweet potatoes, peeled and grated
5 carrots, peeled and grated
2 white potatoes, peeled and grated
1 parsnip, peeled and grated
2 stalks celery, diced
1 cup pitted, softened prunes or dried apricots soaked in water kosher salt and pepper to taste
1/2 tsp. paprika
lemon juice
1 tsp. brown sugar

In a large Dutch oven, heat oil over medium heat, add brisket, turning to brown. Add onions and garlic; cook a few minutes until golden. Add enough water to cover, bring to a boil, reduce heat to low and simmer 2 hours. Transfer brisket to cutting board and slice into 1/2-inch pieces. Return to pot. Add remaining vegetables, dried prunes or apricots (including the water they're soaked in), salt, pepper, paprika and lemon juice. Sprinkle brown sugar on top. Bake in preheated oven at 375 an hour longer. Meat should be so tender it can be cut with a fork. Serves 6.

CELIA'S HORSERADISH

My mother's purism has been passed on to my dad. While others add sugar, salt, even mayonnaise or whipped cream, our chrain is plain, so we get the true taste of the root. They even disclaim beets, which can be added for colour, preferring the root's natural whiteness. They love to remind me that white signifies the purity of the holiday.

1/2 lb. horseradish root, peeled
2 tbsp. apple cider vinegar cold water

Soak horseradish root for an hour in cold water. Grate by hand or in food processor, adding just enough water so that it grates smoothly. It should have the consistency of fine applesauce. Add vinegar and mix until very smooth. Place in a tightly covered glass jar.

CELIA'S POTATO KUGEL

Schmaltz is rendered chicken fat. If you don't want to make it yourself, most kosher butchers carry it during the holidays.

Mama Celia checks her brisket.
[Photo by Julie Siegel]

3 new potatoes, peeled and grated
3 russet potatoes, peeled and grated
lemon juice as needed
2 cups brown onions, grated
1 parsnip, peeled and grated
2 stalks celery, minced
2 cloves garlic, pressed
3 eggs, beaten
1/3 cup matzah meal
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. paprika
1/4 cup vegetable oil or schmaltz
pinch of cayenne

Mix the potatoes with parsnip, celery, garlic, eggs, matzah meal, salt, paprika and cayenne. Sprinkle with lemon juice to prevent discolouration. Transfer mixture to clean bowl. Fold in oil. Place mixture in oiled, 9-in. square glass baking dish. Bake at 375 for 30 to 40 minutes or until golden brown and crisp at edges. Serves 4 to 6.

Passover Food Ideas

A new collection of recipes

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Pam Reiss, a wonderful Winnipeg caterer, certainly knows how stressful Passover cooking can be. It's difficult enough to deal with shopping, cleaning and preparing your kitchen for Pesach without adding the preparation for larger than usual crowds for the seders. Choosing the menu is always a challenge, considering fussy eaters, health issues, vegetarians, family members who are anticipating the traditional Passover dishes that have been passed down for generations. Or maybe try something new this year?

Pamela Reiss' excellent new cookbook, Passover: A Kosher Collection, offers a wide selection of creative, delicious dishes that are sure to impress family and friends. Her recipes will create some special food memories for those sitting at your Passover table this year and in the years to come.

Passover: A Kosher Collection contains beautiful colour photos and a wide variety of recipes with simple, yet explicit, instructions. There are sample menus to get you started and ideas for entertaining, including hors d'oeuvres, dips and nibbles, main dishes, sides and a large selection of desserts and baking. This book can help you become your own caterer this Pesach!

When planning a holiday meal, Reiss admits that it's often a toss-up between the dishes she grew up with and more contemporary meals. She writes, "There are wonderful memories linked to all of the traditional recipes that my grandmothers and parents have passed down to me. I like to make the same brisket that my father makes, which is the same one that his mother made. My mother taught me how to make chicken soup, and each spoonful reminds me of hers. Each time I prepare or am served these recipes, it connects me to my family and our history."

She continues, "Most of us have a handful of recipes that we pull out every Passover, year after year. It's fun to try new things, as long as your guests are up for it. A good compromise is to stick with traditional foods for the seders and try new recipes during chol hamoed. Brisket, although wonderful, can become tiresome by Day 5. And no matter how many different ways we find to dress up matzah, it tends to be heavy and it doesn't have to be the star of every meal. But a bowl of potato gnocchi with some tomato sauce or a simple grilled lamb chop with lemon potatoes are great alternatives."

Several members of Reiss' family, along with friends, were involved in this huge undertaking, wearing the hats of editor, taster, cheerleader, technical support, food stylist and photography team.

Passover: A Kosher Collection is available at booksellers, or check out www.pamelareiss.com. Reiss has shared the following recipes that you can mix and match alongside some of your traditional family favourites. Enjoy!

PINEAPPLE TURKEY MEATBALLS

To make a lighter version, I'll often use ground turkey or chicken as a substitute for beef in meatballs. But this recipe was created with turkey in mind – I think the sauce works well with turkey, but don't let that stop you if you want to try it with chicken or beef!

Sauce

28 oz.canned whole tomatoes
2 large garlic cloves, crushed
2 tsp. fresh ginger, minced
20 oz. canned pineapple chunks, with the juice
1/4 cup brown sugar
3 tbsp. tomato paste

Meatballs

1 1/2 lb. ground turkey
1 large egg
5 oz. yellow onion, peeled and finely minced (1 small)
1 tsp. fresh ginger, minced
1 garlic clove, crushed
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. black pepper
1/2 cup matzah meal
2 tbsp. cold water

Preheat the oven to 350. Put the whole tomatoes with the juice into a mixing bowl and use an immersion blender to puree. Add the rest of the sauce ingredients and stir together.

A simple but elegant dish

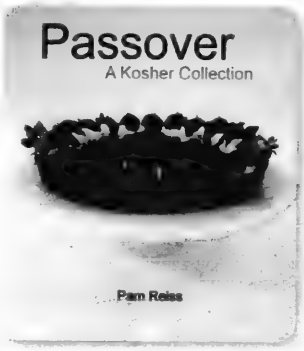
In another mixing bowl, combine the meatball ingredients and mix well. Ladle some sauce into the bottom of an oven-safe baking dish. Form the turkey mixture into balls the size of large walnuts – you should get about 24.

Lay as many meatballs as you can on top of the sauce in a single layer and pour some sauce over them. Add the remaining meatballs in a second layer and add the remaining sauce, spooning it on and making sure that all the meatballs are covered.

Cover the dish with a lid or aluminum foil and bake for 1-1/2 hours. Remove from the oven and serve or chill and reheat for serving later. Serves 6.



HERB ROASTED CORNISH HENS

This is a really simple poultry recipe that will make your guests think you spent hours on the prep. There's no need to marinate the hens, but you can certainly prep them a few hours in advance, refrigerate, then put them in to roast about one hour before you're ready to eat.

2 1.5-lb. Cornish hens, cut in half
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tbsp. olive oil
2 large garlic cloves, crushed
1 tsp. finely chopped fresh rosemary
2 tsp.finely chopped fresh oregano
1 tbsp. finely chopped fresh Italian parsley
1/2 tsp. black pepper
3/4 tsp. salt

Preheat the oven to 375. Clean and rinse the hens and pat them dry with paper towel. Place the hens in a roasting pan, skin side up.

Mix the remaining ingredients together in a small bowl and pour the mixture over the hens. Rub the mixture into each half, making sure you use your fingers to push some under the skin.

Arrange the hens in a single layer in the pan, then roast for half an hour. Spoon some of the juices over the hens and roast another half hour, until the skin is golden brown and the juices run clear when you stick the point of a knife into the leg joint. Serves 4.

VEGETABLE KUGEL

I tend to think of kugels as starches, rather than vegetables. This kugel is so full of different vegetables that it's fighting to be counted as a vegetable. Either way, it's delicious.

3 tbsp. olive oil
6 oz. yellow onion, peeled and diced small (1 small)
1 small orange or yellow bell pepper, cored, seeded and diced small
2 ribs celery, diced small
2 tsp. salt, divided
1/2 tsp. black pepper, divided
3 medium carrots, peeled and shredded
1 medium zucchini, trimmed and shredded
4 cups spinach, roughly chopped
1 lb. red potatoes, peeled and shredded
1 1/2 cups matzah meal
5 large eggs
1 tsp.paprika
2 tbsp. chopped fresh flat leaf parsley
1 tsp. fresh thyme leaves

Preheat the oven to 375. Heat the olive oil in a large pot over medium-high heat. Add the onion, bell pepper, celery, 1/2 tsp. salt and 1/4 tsp. pepper and cook, stirring for 5-6 minutes, until the vegetables start to soften.

Add the carrots and zucchini and cook another 3-4 minutes, until soft. Add the spinach, in batches, and cook until wilted. It will take 2-3 minutes to wilt all of the spinach.

Pour the vegetables into a colander and set it over a bowl to drain as it cools. There's no need to squeeze any moisture out, but this will remove some excess liquid.

Once the vegetables are cool, transfer them to a large mixing bowl and add the potatoes, 1 1/2 tsp. salt, 1/4 tsp. pepper, matzah meal, eggs, paprika and herbs. Mix everything together.

Transfer the mixture to an 8 x 11-in. baking dish that's been sprayed or brushed with oil. Place in the oven and bake for 60 minutes, or until golden brown. Serves 8-10.

Israel not apartheid state: Arab scholar

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Israel is not an apartheid state, according to Mohammed Wattad, an Israeli Arab who is a senior lecturer at Zefat College's school of law in Safed and editor of the journal Medicine and Law.

Wattad spoke at the University of Manitoba during Israel Apartheid Week (IAW) earlier this month, although virtually no IAW organizers or supporters came to hear his lecture.

Wattad said that as "an Israeli citizen… I have no other home than the State of Israel. I am a proud Israeli citizen, but that doesn't mean I can't criticize it… At the same time I am a proud Arab national. I like Arab culture, people, etc.… These are not contradictory things."

He added, "Don't tell me Israel can't define itself as Jewish and democratic… This doesn't mean that Israel is innocent in [Mideast conflict], but there are others here that also aren't innocent."

Wattad, a Muslim, was the 2007 recipient of the award for best oralist for legal arguments given by the International Institute of Higher Studies in Criminal Science. The articulate Wattad spoke about the difference between discrimination and apartheid.

"Is there discrimination in Israel? Yes, there is discrimination against women, elderly, Arabs, Russian Jews, Christians… But the same goes for Canada. Is it good? No. But it means we have to deal with the problem from within… The existence of discrimination in a state does not mean it is an apartheid state… There is a big difference between apartheid and discrimination," he said.

"In an apartheid regime, there is no possibility of judicial review, because the judges are appointed by the regime and all serve one ideology. This is not the case in Israel… There is a very strong, independent supreme court in Israel. In an apartheid regime [unlike in Israel], there is no place to go to argue against the government," Wattad added.

He noted for example that in the case of Israel's security fence, there were "'more than 163 judgments of the Supreme Court where they decided that the fence had to be rerouted or rebuilt."

Regarding Israel's national anthem, Wattad, who was a Bretzfelder Constitutional Law Fellow at Columbia University and special fellow of the Institute for Israel and Jewish Studies, believes that the words "nefesh yehudi" (the Jewish soul/spirit) ought to be changed to be inclusive of Arabs, Christians and non-Jewish citizens. He proposes that the words be changed to refer to "an Israeli spirit" rather than a "Jewish spirit."

Wattad said that the "big problem is the [Palestinian] right of return. Is it a right of return to West Bank and Gaza or a right of return to Jaffa and Haifa? One possible solution is for Palestinians to receive an apology in addition to compensation. After World War II, the Jewish people got an apology from the Germans as well as money [reparations]. It was very important that they got an apology, which was an acknowledgement of collective responsibility."

When asked whether he thought an economic boycott of Israel would be effective, Wattad answered that it would be "useless" because, he said, "Who of the Arab states will boycott Israel economically?… They will help Israel out."

Despite the official position of Arab states, they "are doing business with Israel," he added, giving the Dubai as an example.

"The biggest gas pipeline in Israel is jointly owned by Israel and Iran, and has been that way since it was established… at the time of prime minister Golda Meir."

He further noted that in the case of war with Iran, "Saudi Arabia will allow Israel to use its air space."

גידי קורן וחברים

עבריית קשה שפה

השפה העברית בצרות גדולות-דור שלם גדל כשבפיו שפה עילגת למדית שהתחנטנו בארץ. אתה הולך ברחוב ושומע בני נוער וחיילים אומרים " שלש בחורים" ו"שלושה מכדניות". פה מצבנו לא טוב בהרבה, כי בגלל הריחוק היומיומי מהעברית והשימוש החלקי בה- אנשים רבים הולכים ושוכחים. ועל כן החלטתי לפתוח תת- מדור חדש שיוקדש לנושא.

ב"שלום עורכנו" הסכיר הרב לנדא את פרשת השבוע וסיפר שהכיור שעמד בפתח אוהל המועד שימש לרחיצת ידי הכהנים ורגליהם, ומשני צידי הכיור היו קבועים ברזים "שבאמצעותם הוריקו את המים". "הוריקו" את המים זה "לצבע אותם בירוק" ("עלי העץ הוריקו"). הפועל הנכון הוא "רוקנו את המים" מלשון "לרוקן".

באיתו עיתון סיקר משה מינקובסקי "שתי אומניות ישראליות". "אומן" הוא אדם שמבצע מלאכות יד , כמו סריגה, קדרות (קרמיקה) ותכשיטים. "אמן" לעומת זאת הוא אדם שעוסק באמנות, כמו ציור, מוסיקה, ריקוד. מינקובסקי התכוון בכתבתו ל "שתי אמניות ישראליות" בלי האות ו. מעניין שבאותו עיתון תיאר יונתן דחוה הלוי "500 אמנים קנדים קוראים לחרם על ישראל" תוך שימוש נכון במושג "אמנים", אבל שישאר בינינו.

אנטישמים מחוץ לארון- יהודים פרוגרסיבים

במועדון הבריאות על שם Y.M.C.A, מקום בו אני נלחם שעות ארוכות מלחמה אבידה נגד דיקנה ושומן, התפתח באחד הימים ויכוח בין החברים על עתיד הכור הגרעיני באירן, בבת עיניו של אחמד הקנזן. מאחר שבמועדוניו יש מגיעים מכל העמים, הגזעים, הדתות והצבעים, התנהל הויכוח בין אירנים, ישראלים וקנדים-יהודים, על עתיד הכור: האם צריך למנוע את המתקן בעודתם האדיבה של מפציצי קרב אמריקאים ומטוסים חמושים במגן-דוד מתחת לכנף? ואז, כאשר הויכוח התנהל באנגלית ובדציבלים ישראליים, קם הוגה דעות מקומי, ערל ממוצא קנדי, עם זנב-סוס, כתובות קעקע ושדיידים עתירי נפח. ובלי להתבלבל הביא ליהודים ולפרסים פתרון פשוט, שאת הפטנט עליו רשם היטלר כבר לפני שמונים שנה. האיש הציע שהדוד סם יטיל פצצת אטום אחת על ישראל והיהודים, ופצצה אחת על הערבים והמוסלמים באשר הם שם. וכך שני הצדדים ימחקו מעל כדור הארץ וחזון אחרית הימים יבוא לעולם. שאלתי את האינטלקטואל מדוע היהודים? והתשובה באה באנגלית שהיתה מביישת את ליזה דוליטל לפני שפגשה את הפרופסור המפורסם. הגאון טען, מבלי להניד עפעף, שהיהודים מנהלים את העולם, מעורבים את הנשיא (אובמה), משפיעים על ראשי ממשלות, שולטים בבנקים, בתעשית המכוניות, תברות נפט, טלויזיה, בידור וכל שטח שמריח כסף. מאחר ואנטישמיות מחלה מאמירה חשוכת מרפא, ונסיון להסביר למטומטם שאין כל דמיון בין שכל לשוריים, אמרתי לבחור שהצדק עמו, ואכן צאצאי אברהם יצחק ויעקב מחזיקים את העולם בכף היד כמו שקיבנ קנג החזק בכפו את הבלונדינית היפה. והוספתי באוזנה נשימה, שכאשר אנחנו, היהודים, הלכנו לאוניברסיטאות, דגרנו על סיפרי לימוד ובילינו בספריות ומעבדות, הוא והבריו לבידה שיחקו הוקי, עישנו עשבי מרפא והשתכרו בקונצרטים של רוק. לכן מה הפלא שאנחנו מהלים את העולם. הבחור, למרות העצבים והשריריים, התלבט, נעל, ועזב את החדר עם פרצוף תשעה באב. מה שמוכיח שלא תמיד צריך להיות צודקים וצדיקים, ולהסביר לגויים שאנחנו קורבנות. חבל על הזמן, כי דעות לא משנים במילים. אנטישמיים לא מתעניינים בעובדות, האמת לא תזדרת דרך קליפה שהתקשתה כבר דורות רבים

Jewish groups decry Ontario NDP leader's remark

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A comment by Ontario New Democratic Party leader Andrea Horwath on Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) has aroused indignation among Jewish community groups.

Horwath recently described a Feb. 25 provincial motion condemning IAW, tabled by Thornhill Progressive Conservative MPP Peter Shurman, as being "divisive by nature."

All 30 members who were present in the 107-seat legislature, including members of the NDP, voted for the resolution to condemn IAW, which has spread to 40 cities around the world since its launch in 2005 at the University of Toronto.

Attempts to reach Horwath were unsuccessful.

Expressing disappointment over Horwath's position, B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president Frank Dimant said, "The fact that [she] is denouncing the anti-IAW motion, while at the same time members of her caucus voted in favour of it is hypocritical."

He added, "The unanimous support for the resolution to condemn the hate-fest known as Israeli Apartheid Week, which often leads to anti-Semitic outbursts, was a very important non-partisan stand against anti-Semitism in Canada."

Describing Horwath's comment as "unhelpful double-speak," Dimant said she should have taken "a more principled position."

Howard English, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's vice-president of strategic communications, issued a sharply worded statement.

"The false Israel apartheid label is divisive, not the condemnation of Israeli Apartheid Week. IAW, based on distortions of history, is designed to stifle dialogue," English said.

"Its objective is singling out Israel among all nations on earth, bringing Israel to its knees, and setting the stage for its demise. Nothing could be more divisive than that."

Shimon Fogel, chief executive officer of the Canada-Israel Committee, said: "What is truly divisive on campus and elsewhere is the canard of characterizing Israel as an apartheid state.

"It is the apartheid campaign that stifles dialogue. Its divisiveness blocks progress toward peace."

Fogel said that IAW's "hateful language" polarizes Canadian campuses in "a toxic and destructive way, isolating and delegitimizing students who are supportive of our sister democracy in the Middle East."

Quebec motion praises rights group

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The National Assembly has weighed in on the controversy that continues to dog the federally funded International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development, which is based in Montreal.

On March 11, the legislature unanimously adopted a motion recognizing the "exemplary work" of the organization, commonly known as Rights and Democracy. It states that the assembly "wishes to see the independence of this institution preserved in order to protect its credibility and continuity."

The motion was initiated by Amir Khadir, the sole MNA for Québec Solidaire, a sovereigntist, left-wing party sympathetic to the Palestinian cause. He tabled it jointly with Robert Dutil, the minister responsible for Canadian intergovernmental affairs.

Last November, the Québec Solidaire officially endorsed the boycott campaign against Israel.

Khadir charged that in the past year, Prime Minister Stephen Harper nominated three board members to Rights and Democracy specifically because they're opposed to funding groups that are critical of Israel's alleged human rights violations.

The motion describes Rights and Democracy as continuing to go through a "grave crisis," even though the federal government has confirmed the appointment of a new president, 1980s-era Quebec Liberal cabinet minister Gérard Latulippe. His nomination to Rights and Democracy was rejected by the opposition.

Rights and Democracy, established in 1988 by the Progressive Conservative government of Brian Mulroney, was set up as a non-partisan entity operating at arm's length from the government.

A bitter rift among members of the board, which is chaired by University of Toronto professor Aurel Braun, and between a majority on the board and the majority of the staff came to light with the sudden death of former president Rémy Beauregard in early January.

Braun has said that one of the most contentious issues was Rights and Democracy's granting of $30,000 to three Middle East non-governmental organizations last year, two Palestinian and one Israeli, to investigate possible human rights violations in the wake of conflict between Israel and Hamas in Gaza.

Khadir personally saluted the Rights and Democracy staff for the "ordeal" they're going through and the "climate of terror" that they continue to endure.

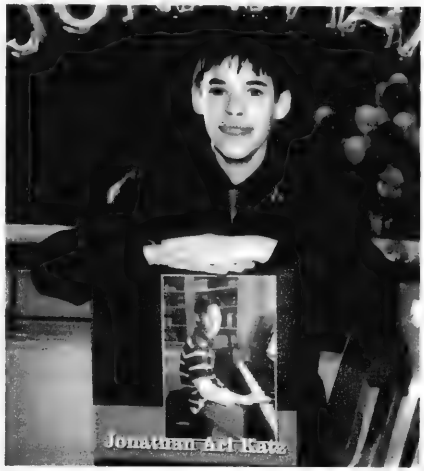
Student raises funds for childhood cancer research

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jonathan Ari Katz has raised more than any other individual for the Childhood Cancer Foundation – Candlelighters Canada, and he would like to raise more.

His goal, in honour of his recent bar mitzvah, is $18,000. According to his page on the foundation's Small Hands website dedicated to small-scale projects, as of last week, Jonathan had raised $13,780, or 76 per cent of his goal, mostly through donations that he requested in lieu of bar mitzvah gifts.



Jonathan Katz sports a gold cancer awareness pin at his recent bar mitzvah.

In fact, he has raised almost $14,500, but a smaller amount is listed on another of the foundation's websites, affiliated with an annual fundraiser that was started by a family friend. His page was moved to Small Hands, which is active year-round, because he would like his fundraising to be ongoing.

The Grade 8 student at Associated Hebrew Schools knows of another youngster who climbed a mountain to raise funds for the organization, and one who rode across Canada on his bicycle, but he believes that "you don't need to do astonishing things to raise a lot of money.

"I wanted to do something special for my bar mitzvah, and I decided to help children all across Canada to find a treatment for cancer [so that] they don't need to go through a lot of pain and suffering," he said in an interview at the school, where his mother Eynat is a vice-principal at the Kamin branch in Thornhill. She and her husband, Arny, a dermatologist, also have a nine-year-old daughter.

The foundation, which was started about seven years ago, funds cancer research in the 17 children's hospitals in Canada. As well, scholarships are given to childhood cancer survivors as they enter post-secondary institutions. Jonathan is funding one scholarship, but the bulk of the money he has raised is designated for research.

Jonathan noted that his grandfather died of cancer, and his grandmother is in remission.

"It's a very common disease. If we can somehow get a cure for it, or at least a treatment that doesn't let children suffer, it will be a big help."

Three hundred and fifty guests celebrated Jonathan's bar mitzvah at Associated's Kamin branch on a Monday morning last month.

An inquisitive 13-year-old who likes math, science, art and music, Jonathan started life as a premature twin, born at 24 weeks, 16 weeks before his due date. It took two months before he reached a weight of one kilogram.

His twin brother, Ari, lived only a few days, and Eynat – who has been a fundraising spokesperson for Women's College Hospital, where Jonathan spent his first four months – said that doctors predicted Jonathan would never walk on his own and would be severely handicapped.

"Which I'm not," he interjected, stating the obvious.

Determined to prove the doctors wrong, Eynat worked with an occupational therapist and a physiotherapist she knew from the Hospital for Sick Children, where she was on staff at the time of Jonathan's birth, doing psychoeducational assessments. They developed a six-hour-a-day therapeutic program, four hours of which Eynat administered herself.

Mary Lye – the foundation's director of marketing and communications and the mother of a childhood cancer survivor – said Jonathan is "an extraordinary role model and leader… not just for children but for adults."

He has always had an interest in research, and wrote in a school project a few years ago about wanting to find a cure for cancer, his mother said.

To continue his fundraising, Jonathan plans to sell gold cancer awareness ribbon pins at his school, as he did at his bar mitzvah.

As well, he would like to start a club for Jewish children at both Jewish and public schools to raise money and socialize together.

"I look at my life as a gift," Jonathan said in his bar mitzvah speech. "I am ready to give something back for all of the help that everyone has given me over my lifetime."

U.S. ties at lowest ebb in 35 years, Israel envoy says

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, has told the country's diplomats there that U.S.-Israeli relations face their worst crisis in 35 years, despite attempts by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's office to project a sense of "business as usual."

Michael Oren

Oren was speaking to Israeli consuls general in a conference call on Saturday night.

On Sunday, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) condemned recent statements by the U.S. government regarding its ties with Israel, amid tensions over Israel's recent announcement of its plan to build 1,600 new housing units in eastern Jerusalem.

"The Obama administration's recent statements regarding the U.S. relationship with Israel are a matter of serious concern," AIPAC said in a statement issued on Sunday. "AIPAC calls on the administration to take immediate steps to defuse the tension with the Jewish State," the statement said.

"The administration should make a conscious effort to move away from public demands and unilateral deadlines directed at Israel, with whom the United States shares basic, fundamental and strategic interests," the AIPAC statement said.

Earlier Sunday, Netanyahu continued to consult with a forum of seven senior cabinet ministers over a list of demands that U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton made in a telephone conversation Friday.

Clinton harshly criticized last week's announcement of plans to expand the Ramat Shlomo neighbourhood in eastern Jerusalem while U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden was visiting Israel.

Ha'aretz has learned that Clinton's list includes at least four steps the United States expects Netanyahu to take to restore confidence in bilateral relations and permit the resumption of peace talks with the Palestinians.

• Investigate the process that led to the announcement of the Ramat Shlomo construction plans in the middle of Biden's visit. The Americans seek an official response from Israel as to whether this was a bureaucratic mistake or a deliberate act carried out for political reasons. Already on Saturday night, Netanyahu announced the convening of a committee to look into the issue.

• Reverse the decision by the Jerusalem District Planning and Building Committee to approve construction of 1,600 new housing units in Ramat Shlomo.

• Make a substantial gesture toward the Palestinians to allow for the renewal of peace talks. The Americans suggested that hundreds of Palestinian prisoners be released, that the Israel Defence Forces withdraw from additional areas of the West Bank and transfer them to Palestinian control, that the siege of the Gaza Strip be eased and further roadblocks in the West Bank be removed.

• Issue an official declaration that talks with the Palestinians, even indirect talks, will deal with all the conflict's core issues – borders, refugees, Jerusalem, security arrangements, water and settlements.

Two of the prime minister's advisers, Yitzhak Molcho and Ron Dermer, held marathon talks Sunday with senior White House officials in Washington and U.S. Mideast envoy George Mitchell and his staff to try to calm the situation. Mitchell was to return to Israel Tuesday to hear whether Netanyahu intends to take the proposed steps.

At the beginning of Sunday's cabinet meeting, Netanyahu tried to convey a message that there was no crisis in relations with the United States. But he sent precisely the opposite message to Oren in Washington.

Embattled Jewish Agency to promote identity over aliyah

By GAL BECKERMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — Natan Sharansky knows he's disturbing the status quo.

Days before the most recent meeting of the board of governors of the Jewish Agency for Israel, Sharansky, the board's relatively new chairman, declared that the Agency's traditional mission had outlived its usefulness.

"It's not enough to speak about aliyah," Sharansky told a delegation of American Jewish leaders. "It's almost prohibited for the head of the Jewish Agency to say so, but it can't be our goal [just] to bring more Jewish people [to Israel]."

With these words – and the recent appointment to key positions of people who share his views – Sharansky has signalled his intent to bring about radical change to the financially strapped Jewish Agency, shifting its focus away from Israel and toward strengthening the secular identity of Diaspora Jews.

Misha Galperin

At the centre of Sharansky's plan is the notion of peoplehood. He and a tight group of ideological allies – mostly other Russian Jews – believe that the Jewish Agency must now become a global promoter of Jewish identity, particularly among the young.

Peoplehood, according to its proponents, is defined as a sense of connectivity among Jews who share a common history and fate. It is still an amorphous concept for some critics. Others wonder if it is too weak a foundation on which to base educational programs – especially since this vision of peoplehood is not predicated on having any kind of religious or spiritual identity.

Nonetheless, this new role for the Jewish Agency is one that Sharansky, by all accounts, seems to be pursuing with great passion. It also comes out of necessity.

Since the establishment of Israel in 1948, the Jewish Agency has been financed through a combination of Israeli government funds and money from the Diaspora. By now, however, it is clear that money from the Diaspora is drying up.

In 1989, the Jewish Agency received $275 million from the North American federations, but last year it received only $130 million, and the projected intake for 2010 is $110 million.

Given that Diaspora money makes up one-third of the Jewish Agency's budget, the drop has been catastrophic for the large bureaucracy.

In response to the decline comes Sharansky's new vision. Though immigration is still a large budget category, this year it will account for barely more than the education department – $100.59 million, as opposed to $94.29 million for education, out of a budget of $321.71 million.

Two recent appointments to high posts in the Jewish Agency are further indication of a change in direction.

A new senior position has been created for Misha Galperin, the current executive vice-president and CEO of the Jewish Federation of Greater Washington. He will be based in New York and provisionally will be in charge of what the Jewish Agency is calling "Global Public Affairs and Financial Resource Development."

Galperin, the most prominent Russian Jew filling a leadership position in the American Jewish organizational world, is one of the main conceptual architects of peoplehood and recently authored a book on the subject.

The Jewish Agency also recently announced that Alan Hoffmann, currently the director general of the Agency's education department, will become the director general of the entire Agency, elevating someone whose orientation is promoting Jewish education.

Of Hoffmann's appointment, Galperin said that he knows "I have a partner in Israel who is exactly the kind of person that I was hoping would be my partner on that side."

With the new positions filled, all that remains is to define exactly what peoplehood is and how a sprawling institution promotes it.

Galperin's definition of peoplehood is "an extended family with a mission," and to promote it, we must engender a feeling of belonging, of community. Advocates say that young Jews must be given experiences – such as Jewish summer camp or the Taglit-Birthright Israel program – that allow them to see their connection to other Jews and identify with the Jewish story.

Galperin says that contrary to what most people think about the Jewish Agency, it already is engaged in many projects that could fall under this rubric, including supporting Israel travel programs and maintaining a network of 400 emissaries in the United States involved in some form of Jewish education.

North American leaders praise Sharansky's plan

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — The leaders of several of the largest North American Jewish federations are praising Natan Sharansky's plans for shifting the focus of the Jewish Agency for Israel from immigration to education and identity building. But reversing the drop in Diaspora dollars will take more than words, some added.

Linda Kislowicz, CEO of UIA Canada, told The CJN that the Canadian federations have been discussing the Jewish Agency's new orientation. The Jewish Agency is the main recipients of funds from Jewish federations channelled through UIA Canada.

"I think there's a very positive response… Strong Jewish identity makes for strong Jewish communities and a strong Israel.

"As to whether it leads to some form of life in Israel, we believe they're connected. It's a shift of resources and focus, but I don't think it's necessarily a dilution of the aliyah message."

As well, she added, the change "makes room for a new and interesting partnership with regard to Israeli and Diaspora Jewry, in which the common denominator is Jewish identity… Programs and resources can be devoted to strengthening Jewish identity among Jewish youth in the Diaspora and Jewish youth in Israel. We have work to do together."

She said the change gives the Jewish Agency "a very current and contemporary platform in which to engage communities and in particular the next generation."

Ted Sokolsky, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said that the change in focus has been in the works for many years, and that Birthright Israel is "probably the most visible program in this line."

Sokolsky was involved in talks leading up to the recently announced changes, particularly as head of the organization of large city directors of Jewish federations in 2007-08.

"There's an understanding that we have to invest more and more in people's – young people's in particular – sense of Jewish peoplehood and their Jewish identity," Sokolsky said.

However, he noted, "it's not a case of the Jewish Agency choosing Jewish identity over aliyah. Aliyah will definitely be enhanced down the road."

Sokolsky said that the change "doesn't seem like such a stretch" for the Jewish community in Canada. "We're already investing significant dollars in Jewish education" – an amount he put at a combined total of almost $25 million between the Jewish communities in Toronto and Montreal.

As well, he added, "you'll see a greater emphasis on what we used to call informal Jewish education," referring to Jewish camping and programs such as March of the Living.

Some major American federations in recent years have complained increasingly about sending overseas large proportions of funds collected locally.

In a prepared statement, Jerry Silverman, the CEO of the Jewish Federations of North America, which serves as the pass-through for federation money to the Jewish Agency, praised the Agency's new direction.

John Ruskay, the CEO of the system's largest federation, the UJA-Federation of New York also praised the shift, but said it was "overstated."

"Let me emphasize I have no doubt the Jewish Agency will continue its commitment to promote and facilitate aliyah," Ruskay said. "Jewish education may be the most effective way to promote aliyah. Even so, we are in a time when pitting aliyah against identity against education against welfare may be anachronistic."

'The crisis was very serious'

In his conference call with the Israeli consuls general, Oren said the current crisis is the most serious with the Americans since a confrontation between Henry Kissinger and Yitzhak Rabin in 1975 over an American demand for a partial withdrawal from the Sinai Peninsula.

At Sunday's cabinet meeting, Netanyahu said the matter had been blown out of proportion by the media. He added: "There was an unfortunate incident here that was innocently committed and was hurtful, and certainly should not have occurred."

He said steps would be taken to prevent such cases in the future. "It is extremely important to understand that the State of Israel and the United States have common interests," he said.

Netanyahu appointed a committee to study the chain of events leading up to last week's housing announcement. The committee will also establish guidelines for ministries and municipalities to prevent similar occurrences in the future.

Four consuls discussed the conference call with Ha'aretz. Some noted that in previous conference calls with Oren, the ambassador took pains to make clear that relations with the United States were excellent. This time, however, Oren sounded extremely tense and pessimistic. Oren was quoted as saying that "the crisis was very serious, and we are facing a very difficult period in relations [between the two countries]."

Oren told participants in the conference call of a meeting he was summoned to on Friday with Deputy Secretary of State James Steinberg for a reprimand. Oren spoke of his surprise at being summoned after believing that the crisis had ended on Thursday.

"Steinberg read to me from the [American] letter of protest, whose content was extremely harsh," Oren reportedly said.

Netanyahu apologized to Biden at the time of the incident last week and the vice-president accepted the apology.

The Palestinian Authority reportedly has said that it will not resume any kind of talks with Israel, including the agreed-upon proximity talks, unless Mitchell brings a promise that Israel will cancel the housing plan for eastern Jerusalem.

Jerusalem is not part of the 10-month West Bank building freeze set by Netanyahu at the end of November.

Rebuilt Hurva synagogue dedicated amid threats

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Monday's dedication of the restored Hurva Synagogue in the Jewish Quarter of the Old City could spark riots, police warned Sunday.

Pamphlets distributed in east Jerusalem claimed the opening of the synagogue was the first step toward the reconstruction of the Temple, while senior Fatah official Mohammed Dahlan and Hatem Abdel Kader, who holds the Jerusalem affairs portfolio in the Palestinian Authority, called on Israeli Arabs to go to the Temple Mount and protect it from Israel.

Israeli security sources speculated the PA is trying to leverage the unrest in east Jerusalem to promote its political agenda and tighten the connection between Jerusalem and the West Bank.

Security officials were to decide on Monday whether to extend the closure on the West Bank announced by Defence Minister Ehud Barak on Saturday. A move usually reserved in recent years for Jewish holidays, the closure was intended to block the spread and escalation of violent demonstrations.

The Hurva synagogue in 1856

On Sunday, thousands of Jewish revellers, guarded by hundreds of police officers, celebrated the entry of the first Torah scroll into the synagogue, then held a festive evening service. No violence took place near the Old City during the event.

The Hurva, considered the most important synagogue in the country for many years, was destroyed at the end of the War of Independence and totally restored during the last five years. Renovated with the help of old photographs, plans and drawings, the synagogue was rebuilt to match the original model identically.

On Monday, the synagogue was formally dedicated by Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu did not attend the ceremony, but delivered a prerecorded video greeting.

"The police will act forcefully to prevent both Muslim and Jewish extremists from disturbing public order and security in the Temple Mount and east Jerusalem," a statement from the police said.

Police and Border Police forces continued their special deployment on Monday, with 2,500 officers spread across the Old City, east Jerusalem and adjacent villages. Entry of Palestinians to the Temple Mount was limited for the fourth day in a row, with only Israeli Muslim men older than 50 and women allowed to enter the compound to pray. No visitors or tourists will be allowed.

The Jerusalem police also withdrew permission for the monthly march around the Old City gates by yeshiva students for fear it would escalate tensions even further.

Police Commissioner David Cohen tried to calm nerves Monday by appealing to all parties.

"The extremist, inciting statements being heard don't correlate to the facts on the ground," Cohen said. "I expect all parties involved to show responsibility, and to moderate any statements that could lead to an unnecessary escalation of violence in the city."

Israeli intelligence services do not believe, however, that the PA is interested in unleashing a full intifadah, or in ratcheting up violence in the West Bank, since this would hamper efforts being made by Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad to build Palestinian institutions and improve the economy.

More funds for needy survivors

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Eight Canadian Jewish organizations providing social services and home care to needy Holocaust survivors will receive increased allocations thanks to an agreement signed by the German government and the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

Last week, following a new round of talks, the New York-based Claims Conference announced that Germany would provide a further $125 million (US) to meet the needs of survivors.

Canadian organizations in line for additional funding are the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors and the group Child Survivors, Hidden Children in Montreal; Jewish Family Services in Ottawa; Baycrest, Circle of Care and Jewish Family and Child in Toronto, and the Jewish Family Service Agency and the Holocaust Education Centre in Vancouver.

Claims Conference spokesperson Hillary Kessler-Godin said the money will be used for home care, food programs, medical aid and emergency assistance.

In a statement, Claims Conference negotiator Stuart Eizenstat said, "The agreement is a major step forward in addressing vital social welfare needs for the poorest of Jewish Holocaust victims living around the world. Much still remains to be done, including a multi-year agreement and continuing to enhance other benefits for the survivors."

Julius Berman, chair of the Claims Conference, said that part of the funds will be channelled into pensions for the elderly. He added, "The Claims Conference's top priority is to continue obtaining funding to assist needy, vulnerable Jewish Holocaust victims in their final years."

Founded in 1951, the Claims Conference allocates funds from Germany to agencies helping needy Holocaust survivors. It also administers compensation funds and recovers unclaimed Jewish property.

Israel Briefs

Soldiers charged

Two soldiers were charged with inappropriate conduct during the Gaza war. The Israel Defence Forces prosecution office filed an indictment alleging the two combat soldiers used a nine-year-old Palestinian boy as a human shield by forcing him to open bags suspected of containing explosives. It was the second indictment against the soldiers for actions in Gaza last winter. In last week's indictment, the soldiers were charged with overstepping authority and conduct unbecoming. They will stand trial in military court and face up to one year in jail. Military police began their investigation into the charges before the Goldstone report was released.

Qassam fired from Gaza

A Qassam rocket fired from Gaza landed in the western Negev last Thursday, causing damage to a building on a kibbutz located near residential buildings. No one was injured. A group affiliated with Al Qaeda claimed responsibility. The attack came just after U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden condemned such attacks on Israel's south and reiterated the U.S. commitment to Israel's security. It was the first rocket fired from Gaza since Feb. 11.

Falash Mora resolution vowed

The plight of Falash Mora will be resolved within a year, Israel's interior minister promised last week. Eli Yishai said the aliyah of the Falash Mora, Ethiopians who claim to be descendants of Jews who were forced to convert to Christianity generations ago, will happen over the next year. He made the remarks in an address to the Knesset state comptroller's committee and the committee for aliyah, absorption and Diaspora affairs. Some 8,700 Falash Mora are waiting for the Jewish Agency to complete eligibility checks. Many already have relatives in Israel. Israeli lawmaker Shlomo Molla, the first Ethiopian MK, visited the Ethiopian city of Gondar in December and reported that those waiting for permission to make aliyah are living in poor conditions.

Turkey rejects quake aid

Turkey turned down Israel's offer of aid following an earthquake in the eastern part of the country. The earthquake registering 6.0 on the Richter scale that struck early on March 8 killed 41 villagers in eastern Turkey and injured 50. Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak instructed his staff to find ways Israel could help in the aftermath, but Turkey reportedly refused the aid, saying it has the experience to handle the disaster. In August 1999, Israel sent a 250-member rescue and recovery team and a field hospital to Turkey following an earthquake measuring 7.4 that killed 18,000.

Illustrator helps kids learn while they colour

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Yehuda Lang may be 30, but he can appreciate a good colouring book.

Lang, a graduate of the Ontario College of Art and Design (OCAD), is the creator of the Super Dooper Most Amazingest colouring book series. The books teach kids about Jewish holidays while they colour, read and play games.

"I always wanted to make a book… I wanted to make the holidays accessible to kids in a fun way," said Lang, who made the series through his graphic design company, 8th Avenue Creative.

"I thought I could do a good job with it and really make the story come alive with vibrant illustrations."

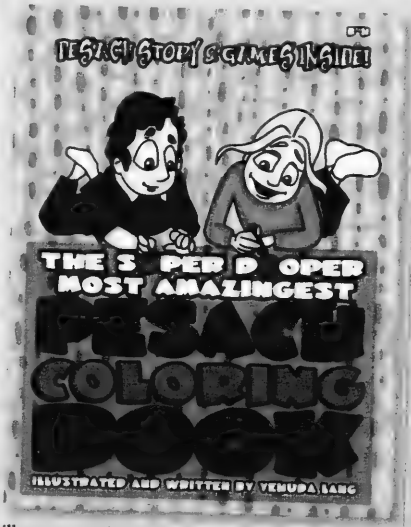
Lang's colouring books have taken children through holidays such as Purim, Chanukah and Pesach, as well as through the Hebrew alphabet.

Lang illustrates and writes the series. While he perfected his writing in college, Lang always had a knack for illustration.

"I was always an artist. That was always my thing," he said. "When I was very little, I was just drawing a lot. All the time."

Eventually, Lang went to OCAD, where he majored in advertising and graduated three years ago.

"I knew I had to go to OCAD… I knew I had to do something with art. I'm also a graphic designer,



PESACH STORY & GAMES INSIDE!
THE SUPER DOOPER MOST AMAZINGEST
PESACH COLORING BOOK
ILLUSTRATED AND WRITTEN BY YEHUDA LANG

illustrator and web designer," he said, adding that learning about advertising helped him improve his writing and to communicate effectively.

"I was always doing jobs as an illustrator. I wanted to do my own projects," he said.

About a year ago, he started working on the colouring book series with his wife, Ester, who helped with marketing and sales.

"I always talked about it, I always wanted to do it. To actually get it going, it was both of us. [I said] 'We'll give it a shot, hit or miss, we'll see what happens,'" he said.

So far, the series just may be a hit. The colouring books are being used by various schools, including the Chabad Romano Hebrew School in Maple, Ont., and are now on sale at two Indigo locations in Toronto, at Yonge Street and Eglinton Avenue and at Yorkdale shopping centre, as well as in select Judaica and grocery stores in Canada and the United States.

When he's working on a colouring book, Lang starts by researching the holiday.

"You know the story, but you want to know it perfectly," he said, adding that he then makes a storyboard for each page.

"There's obviously a lot of rewriting and re-drawing… It's a tricky thing, it's not like math homework," he said, adding that every detail, from word choice to the shape of a character's nose or eyes, is crucial. "There are a lot of decisions… The look of the characters, the language you use. It has to be accessible."

The Super Dooper Most Amazingest colouring books have more dialogue than most, which means that it's important to hit the right tone with the narrative, Lang said.

"Sometimes, when I'm first writing, it's kind of stiff, it's not smooth. Sometimes, when you write it, it kind of flows," he said, explaining that it helps to talk out what he's about to write first.

"If I'm trying to think too hard, chances are it's not good."

While viewing one of Lang's storyboards, an author told him to draw characters according to "what you want the kid to see."

"[The author] was saying, 'Make your characters

Yehuda Lang, 30, uses his colouring book series to teach children about Jewish holidays.

look brave.' Kids relate through the characters… you always have to be portraying what you want the kid to see. If he sees the kid that's wimpy, he's going to relate that to himself," he said.

While Lang is careful to stay true to the history of each holiday, his goal is to make something that kids can relate to.

"[The books are] very friendly, very lively, very whimsical," he said.

Because his audience is young, Lang is sometimes forced to tinker with the details of each holiday. In the Chanukah book, he made one of the Maccabees a child in order to get his readers more involved.

"When the kid reads the books, [they] become the character. I try to bring the kids into it to internalize the character," he said.

Lang decided to make colouring books rather than storybooks because he wanted to engage his audience, he said.

"When you're actually colouring in the stories, it's more involvement. The kid takes part [in the story]," he said. "There's more games [in the books]. A lot of the times, kids go right to the games."

For Lang, his two-year-old son is his most important critic.

"He actually loves [it]. He reads [the series] more as a book. He colours, but that's what's special about these books. Most colouring books [have] one line per page. This really reads as a book," he said.

Lang was drawn to colouring books because of his connection with children, he said.

"I think I'm good with kids. I generally have that… attachment. I've always played with kids. I feel like I can get down to their level, it's a smooth transition," he said.

Opera gives voice to anti-Nazi campaign

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

There were thousands of faces staring down at Judy Kopelow at the Holocaust museum in Washington, D.C., but she only saw two.

They were young but determined. Fresh-faced but defiant. They weren't Jewish but they had earned a place in the museum's exhibit about non-Jews who had fought against the Nazi regime.

They were casualties of The White Rose, but Kopelow didn't know that when she visited the exhibit several years ago. All she knew was their names – Hans and Sophie Scholl.

"There was a charm about them. They seemed young and they had a spirit," Kopelow said of their photo.

"It sounds so corny, but I just loved them. I wanted to know who they were – there was something about them."

And so she searched, unearthing every book about the Scholls that she could find. Soon she learned that they were students at the University of Munich who were involved in an anti-fascism group at their school between 1942 to 1943 called The White Rose. The movement was an intellectual protest that spread its message through leaflets. The Scholls were eventually caught for handing out the leaflets and were executed by the Nazis.

Through her research, Kopelow also found out that an opera had been written about their story by Udo Zimmerman.

"I came back to Toronto and went to Sam the Record Man in the classical record department. By chance they had two copies of the opera," she said. "I listened to it and was just very, very moved by it... I just thought the story had to be told."

Kopelow set about telling it. She began producing the opera, White Rose, which follows the Scholls' life story, and she will bring it to the University of Toronto's Hart House on April 8.

"Besides the music being very, very beautiful, yet tragic, it's a testament to the strength of the human spirit," she said, adding that she first produced White Rose about six or seven years ago. "However dark the evil force might be, there always seem to be those that rise against it."

Kopelow brought the play to the University of Toronto about five years ago and thought it was time to bring it back. She approached Hillel of Greater Toronto and the Centre for Jewish Studies at U of T, and it didn't take Hindy Najman, the centre's director, long to agree.

"My response was, 'Let's do it,'" Najman said, adding that she taught students about The White Rose movement. "I visited Munich, I saw the homes of Hans and Sophie Scholl. [The opera] is a very powerful narrative, it's a very tragic narrative, but we're reminded about what we should be called upon to do in moments of loss and tragedy."

For Doris Bergen, the chancellor of the Rose and Ray Wolfe chair in Holocaust studies, the opera is about more than just Holocaust education.

"People think White Rose was an anti-Holocaust resistance. That's part of it," she said. "In general, they were protesting the crimes of Nazi Germany. They were protesting a barbaric way of waging warfare."

Bergen thinks it's appropriate that Kopelow took the opera to a university.

"It's important for students to think about the way that... a group of students... tried to organize an intellectual protest. I think it's really important to have that challenge to students," she said. "It's really a challenge to the university as a whole. When [Hans and Sophie] were executed, not a single representative of the university came to their defence. It's a story of heroism, but it's a heroism that really highlights the much broader sort of failure [of universities]."

For Kopelow, opera is a good way to tell this story.

"People talk to me about why [have an] opera. It's because... an operatic voice is so powerful. You can't get your head around where that strength could come from," she said.

White Rose will be performed April 8 at 7:30 p.m. at Hart House. For tickets or more information, call 416-913-2424.

Thriller portrays search for Iraq's WMDs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Green Zone, Paul Greengrass' action thriller set in Baghdad during and shortly after the 2003 allied invasion of Iraq, resembles his two previous films, The Bourne Ultimatum and United 93, at least in terms of style.

Now playing in Toronto, Green Zone is a scintillating exercise in filmmaking, full of suspense, intrigue, controlled mayhem and, of course, non-stop violence. In essence, it's like a superior video game.

But Greengrass, a skilled director, has more than entertainment in mind. Beyond the subliminal level, this is a politically driven film about the futile search for Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction, the United States' oft-stated rationale for embarking on what would be an unpopular war.

In short, Greengrass doesn't buy into the thesis that the Iraqi Baathist regime possessed biological, chemical and nuclear weapons of mass destruction after United Nations inspectors scoured Iraq in the wake of the1991 Gulf War.

As may be recalled, these monitors destroyed tons of military equipment that Iraq had hoarded for years. Nonetheless, major intelligence agencies in the West were convinced that more such weapons could be found.

Brian Helgeland's crackling, though sometimes opaque, script is broadly based on Rajiv Chandrasekaran's 2006 book, Imperial Life in the Emerald Zone, a reference to the sedate Baghdad neighbourhood where Saddam and his closest cronies lived and worked and in which the Americans established their posh headquarters in the aftermath of the invasion.

The film turns on the real-life adventures of U.S. army chief warrant officer Richard Gonzales, whose "mobile exploitation team" was tasked with the mission of unearthing WMDs.

Gonzales, known in the movie as Roy Miller, is expertly portrayed by the no-nonsense actor Matt Damon. He arrives in Baghdad shortly after the Americans have captured the city in a shock-and-awe offensive that unseats Saddam's brutal regime but unleashes a wave of looting, chaos and confusion.

Gung-ho at first, Miller soon comes to the jarring realization that U.S. intelligence data on WMDs is dead wrong.

Matt Damon stars as a U.S. officer charged with finding weapons of mass destruction in Iraq.

"The intel's no good," Miller says. But the Pentagon's insufferable man in Baghdad, Poundstone (Greg Kinnear), begs to differ with his downbeat assessment. "We'll find weapons," he says. "Don't worry about it."

Miller recruits Freddy (Khalid Abdalla), an anti-Saddam local Iraqi, to help him track down Saddam's supposed caches of WMDs. Freddy puts Miller on the trail of a menacing Iraqi general who may well know where they're hidden.

Miller, however, is on a fool's errand. Brown (Brendan Gleeson), the CIA's Baghdad bureau chief, claims that "the cupboard is bare." Iraq has been swept clean of WMDs. With this subversive suggestion, Greengrass leaves a viewer with the unmistakable impression that a turf war – a battle of wills – has broken out between the CIA and the Pentagon, and that the Pentagon's number 1 official in Baghdad may be concealing a terrible truth.

In trashing the official U.S. account of the war, Greengrass casts doubt on the integrity of a gullible American correspondent (Amy Ryan) who has covered the WMD story at length, and suggests that the Iraqi insurgency could have been nipped in the bud had the United States recruited senior Iraqi army officers and not disbanded key Iraqi ministries. As well, he seems to scoff at the notion that democracy can be grafted on Iraq's tribal society.

To hammer home his point that the United States stumbled in Iraq, Greengrass replays the now embarrassing May 2003 "Mission Accomplished" clip in which then-U.S. president George W. Bush prematurely declared victory.

In a final dig toward the close of Green Zone, Greengrass inserts a scene that encapsulates his perception of the invasion. Freddy, in a heated exchange with Miller, exclaims, "It's not for you to declare what happens here."

From a strictly moral point of view, Greengrass may be right, but in the world of Realpolitik, he is astonishingly naive.

A riveting documentary about uncontrollable passions

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Burt Pugach, a prosperous Jewish lawyer in New York City, was absolutely smitten when he first laid eyes on Linda Riss, an attractive, single Jewish woman. Never had he seen a more beautiful, beguiling sight.

After contacting her and sending her a bouquet of roses, she agreed to date Burt, who, as she discovered, was considerably older, weird and less than good looking. But since he was "a lot of fun" and owned a late-model Cadillac convertible, a private plane and a nightclub, she was impressed.

Linda Riss and Burt Pugach's strange relationship is the subject of Crazy Love.

Here was a man who might give her a ticket to a comfortable life.

There was only one minor, niggling glitch: he was married. Burt promised to divorce his wife as soon as possible, but his missus did not co-operate. As the plot thickened, Linda learned that he was deceptive, obsessive and sex-addled.

Burt's insatiable quest for Linda took on the trappings of a soap opera and became the grist for sensational tabloid stories.

Crazy Love, a riveting documentary by Dan Klores, is about one man's compulsive attraction for a seemingly unattainable and virginal woman.

It will be presented by the Toronto Jewish Film Society on March 21 at 4 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre (750 Spadina Ave.).

Crazy Love has all the elements of a classic melodrama: uncontrollable passions, unbridled jealousy and violence culminating in a crime of passion that shocked a supposedly shock-proof and cynical metropolis.

The 92-minute film unfolds through talking heads and banner headlines. Burt and Linda, as well as their friends and enemies, appear on screen. Jimmy Breslin, a famous New York newspaper columnist, also puts in an appearance.

Burt, a shady lawyer who was not above bilking the city for his services, is at the centre of Crazy Love. His attitude was that if he could not win Linda's heart, no one else would. "He got his wish," says Linda with a mixture of awe and annoyance.

Even after another suitor swept Linda off her feet, Burt was still madly in love with her. So much so that he took leave of his senses and hired a thug to disfigure her. Burt's rashness and stupidity landed him in jail, where he tried to commit suicide.

After he recovered, he dispatched a torrent of lovesick letters to Linda, who in the meantime had fallen into dire financial straits. "There was no getting away from Burt," she says with an air of resignation.

Incredibly enough, the pair resumed their strange relationship after Burt was paroled, prompting yet another round of breathless headlines and invitations from television talk-show hosts.

Klores is clearly fascinated by their most unusual romance, and in Crazy Love, he tells a crackling story about the follies and absurdities of human behaviour.

Israeli films keep missing Oscar mark

By TOM TUGEND
JTA

LOS ANGELES — Israeli films have been among Oscar finalists nine times but have never picked up the top prize. How come?

In the last few years, the quality of the 14 or so films annually produced in Israel have taken a quantum leap upward.

The main reasons are the rise of a group of talented young filmmakers, who often cut their teeth on television shows; a parallel increase in skilled producers; and the focus on more relevant stories, according to Katriel Schory, executive director of the Israel Film Fund, a publicly funded agency that subsidizes most Israel-made films at a total rate of $5 million to $6 million (US) per year.

One payoff has been that in each of the last three years, a critically acclaimed Israeli film has made the final five list in the foreign language film category.

In 2008, it was Beaufort, followed the next year by Waltz with Bashir – both powerful and innovative perspectives on Israel's wars with Lebanon.

This year, although another war movie, Lebanon, was under serious consideration, the Israel Academy chose the offbeat Ajami, an insider view of Jewish-Arab and Arab-Arab tensions in the mixed quarter of the same name in Jaffa.

Despite very strong competition from many countries, foremost France and Germany, Ajami made the first cut to nine semi-finalists, and then on to the five finalists.

To general surprise, the winner turned out to be the little-seen or publicized Argentine movie The Secret in Their Eyes, a thriller about an unsolved 25-year-old case involving the murder and rape of a young woman.

Critics have become used to odd choices by the foreign film selection committee, but this year's pick seemed to repeat the previous year's pattern too closely to be coincidental.

In both years, four of the five finalists were edgy, tough and innovative films, while the fifth tended to be softer, conventional and more in the Hollywood tradition.

Due to a convoluted selection process, the judges on the selection committee tend to be older academy members with more time on their hands and more attuned to traditional movies.

Schory has no doubt that these circumstances led to the selection of the conventional Argentine film over the edgier entries, such as the highly favoured A Prophet from France, The White Ribbon from Germany, and Ajami.

"What happens is that a large portion of judges favoured the one conventional film, while the rest split their votes among the more innovative films," said Schory, who left Los Angeles immediately after the Oscar ceremonies to return to Israel.

Schory noted Israeli filmmakers have no intention of changing the style or content of their films to please the academy judges and boost their chances for an Oscar win. "The 700 members of the Israel Academy pick the best film on its merits," he said, "not what might please an overseas audience or judges."

Remembering J.D. Salinger

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Not having published a thing in almost half a century apparently hasn't diminished the fame of America's most reclusive writer. J. D. Salinger died in January at the age of 91, prompting some hopeful observers to wonder whether he left a vault full of manuscripts to be published posthumously.

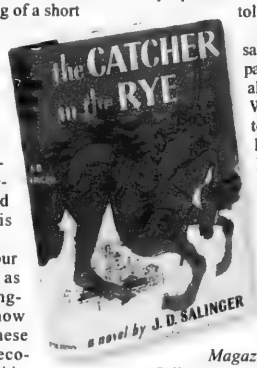
Jerome David Salinger

Born in New York in 1919 to a Jewish father and Scotch-Irish Catholic mother, Salinger began publishing stories in magazines in 1940. He produced about 30 pieces for "the slicks" – Colliers, Saturday Evening Post, Good Housekeeping, et al – but refused to have these early works collected and republished, taking legal action when a pirated edition appeared in 1974. In 1946, he began a long and almost exclusive association with The New Yorker that would continue until his last story appeared there in 1965. These were the "quality" stories, many of which made it into his definitive collection, Nine Stories (1953).

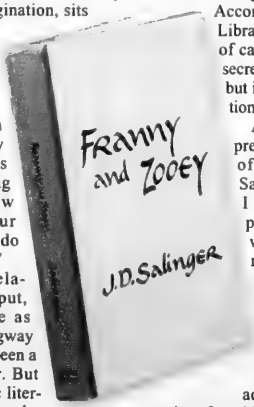
By then, Salinger was already a household name, his one and only novel – Catcher in the Rye – having catapulted to bestsellerdom immediately upon its publication in 1951. Even today, the name of its adolescent protagonist, Holden Caulfield, still represents the archetypal young anti-hero, full of teenage angst as he battles social pretension wherever he sees it.

Several of the pieces in Nine Stories, including A Perfect Day for Bananafish, Uncle Wiggily in Connecticut and For Esme With Love and Squalor, mirror the notion at the heart of Catcher that the adult world is a place of perfidious falseness that infects young people like a contagion. In the Salinger worldview, children are sweet and innocent but inevitably become corrupted once they grow up.

In some of the stories and in his two final books – Franny and Zooey (1961) and Raise High the Roof Beam, Carpenters, and Seymour: An Introduction (1963), both consisting of a short story and a novella – Salinger became increasingly preoccupied with the Glass family. The tragic Seymour, Buddy, Boo-Boo, Franny, Zooey and other children of former vaudevillian parents, Les and Bess Glass, were his central characters.



Following Seymour into show business as principals in the long-running hit radio show It's a Wise Child, these children become precocious, witty, ultra-sensitive and spiritually enhanced adults who must still confront the conundrum of remaining pure in a patently false world. For Seymour, the solution is a self-inflicted bullet to the temple, administered without overt warning at the end of Bananafish. Although Seymour's ghostly shadow haunts the younger Glass siblings, he remains their eternal guide and mentor. It is he who introduces them to Zen Buddhism and to the anonymous "fat lady" who, in their imagination, sits on a porch on sweaty summer afternoons, swatting flies and listening to It's a Wise Child on the radio. Buddy always shined his shoes before going on the radio show because Seymour had told him to "do it for the fat lady."



Despite his relatively sparse output, Salinger became as popular as Hemingway or Fitzgerald had been a generation earlier. But unlike these iconic literary figures, he refused to play the role of a celebrated American writer, refused to live a fishbowl existence to satisfy the public's craving for information. Instead, he hid with his family in a rural house in the village of Cornish, N.H.

In Cornish, America's most famous literary recluse was anything but a hermit. Conducting himself like an ordinary citizen, he played bridge with neighbours, attended monthly church suppers, frequented the local diner and general store. Protective of his privacy, the local townsfolk sometimes sent inquisitive reporters and fans "on a little goose chase," Mike Ackerman, proprietor of the Cornish General Store, told the Boston Globe.

Despite these precautions, salacious stories and even paparazzi photographs occasionally appeared about Salinger. While he cleverly managed to elude reporters after his house caught fire in 1992, he was less successful with two friends, each coincidentally a Canadian or former Canadian, responsible for publicizing details about his private life.

In 1972, after Yale freshman Joyce Maynard wrote a cover story for The New York Times Magazine about life in the '60s, Salinger wrote to her and struck up a relationship with her that, 25 years later, she described in her book, At Home in the World. And E. Michael Mitchell, a Toronto-born artist who designed a cover for Catcher (one of the few instances in which Salinger allowed artwork of any sort to grace the covers of his books) maintained a long friendship and correspondence with the writer. Mitchell died last year but not before parting with some of the letters, 11 of which are now the property of Manhattan's Morgan Library and Museum. According to a news report, the Library – "out of an abundance of caution" – kept the letters a secret while Salinger was alive, but is now preparing an exhibition.

Are literary executors presently poring over a trove of first-rate, unpublished Salinger stories? Somehow I doubt it. Salinger's last published works seemed to veer dangerously close to modern deconstructionism. Most apparent in Seymour: An Introduction is the author's increasing intrusion as narrator, talking directly to the reader, distancing us from plot, action and character with a series of rambling asides and sometimes-cloying devices. The tendency is even more pronounced in Salinger's last published New Yorker piece, Hapworth 16, 1924, an overly long, ruminative story about the Glass family. It may be that Salinger stopped publishing because he wisely decided to keep his legacy sparse so it would always shine as brilliantly as glass.

Camp Massad founding 'eemah' honoured

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Leona Billinkoff said she was "overwhelmed."

"I didn't expect so many Camp Massad alumni," she said.

The occasion, on Feb. 28, was a celebration of Billinkoff's 90th birthday, organized by the board of directors of Camp Massad, the Hebrew-language summer camp that Billinkoff headed for 26 years.

And a typical Massad celebration it was. The event, which was held at the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre, began with camp songs sung by the Massad alumni choir, with many of the other 70 or so guests joining in.

That was followed by a skit based on awards shows such as the Oscars and Emmys. This version was called the "Eemahs," the title by which the Camp Massad administrators are traditionally known. One of the highlights was a song by Toronto-based entertainer David Gale, a Massad alumnus. He sang a parody of I Am Reviewing the Situation from the musical Oliver! describing his memories of Massad.

At the end, Billinkoff was presented with a lifetime Eemah Award.

"Without Mrs. B, there wouldn't have been a Camp Massad," says alumnus Elliott Leven, who has remained a close friend of Billinkoff over the years.

Leven first got to know the renowned camp eemah when he signed on as a camper in 1973. He later worked with her as a counsellor. "We became friends when I served as president of the board," he said. "I looked to Leona for advice on numerous occasions. We are still friends and she still gives good advice."

Massad is a Jewish camp unlike any other. Not only is it a Hebrew immersion experience for the campers, but also there has always been an emphasis on art, dance and culture, as well as traditional camping activities. In part, that is a reflection of the leadership of Billinkoff, who is an artist and craftsperson.

The camp is located just north of Winnipeg Beach, which is a 45-minute drive northwest of Winnipeg and has long been a popular summer resort for Jewish Winnipeggers. Camp Massad grew out a Labour Zionist-oriented summer camp.

According to historian Allan Levine in his Coming of Age: A History of the Jewish People of Manitoba, in 1952, most of the young Habonim counsellors were planning on making aliyah. One of the group, Soody Kleiman, thought it fitting if the camp site was used for a Hebrew-speaking camp. He and some friends lobbied leaders of Keren Hatarbut and Winnipeg's Labour Zionist movement and convinced them to support a kosher, Hebrew-speaking camp on the site.

Kleiman became the first senior counsellor responsible for programming.

Billinkoff, at that time, was a young mother of three children and a volunteer with the Talmud Torah school. Rabbi Avraham Kravetz, the school's principal, promoted the new camp among the school's students. Ed Yuditsky, a former Talmud Torah teacher, was hired as the camp director. Billinkoff was persuaded to become the first administrator, or eemah.

"My time as eemah at Camp Massad was a wonderful experience," she said. "It changed my life.

"My brother has just died. I had been working hard. It was suggested that Camp Massad was a place where I could get some rest. As soon as I got there and saw how much there was to do, I got right down to work."

Leona Billinkoff at her 90th birthday party.

She added she had always enjoyed working with children. Camp Massad, she told Levine, was a place where little boys could learn to dance and little girls to hammer nails. It was a place where everyone would sing and appear on stage. The emphasis was on menschlichkeit.

The camp site was relatively primitive at the beginning. Billinkoff's husband, Alex, who was a partner in the family lumber business, contributed largely to the physical development of the camp over the years.

Billinkoff says that she never had a particular plan or philosophy for the camp. "I learned from Soody Kleiman [who attended Billinkoff's 90th birthday celebration] and the other camp directors," she says.

"It was Soody, for example, who taught me a love for Israel. He and the other Habonim people had a special attitude. They were so creative. Camp Massad was just what I needed at that time in my life."

Billinkoff said that her goal during her time at Massad was to keep the camp going in the teeth of opposition from the Jewish community leadership, who favoured the longer-running B'nai Brith camp.

"No one in the first few years was prepared to help us, not even the Zionist organizations," she recalled. "I was stubborn. I spent a lot of time fighting for the camp."

She says she decided to retire once a core of Massad alumni were prepared to take over the running of the camp.

Camp Massad has a brand new eemah for this year. Regina Teplitsky, a recent arrival from Israel, took charge of the camp at the beginning of this year. She reported that so far more than 100 children are registered for camp this summer.

While most of the campers are from Winnipeg, the camp also attracts children from other parts of Canada and the United States, she said.

Jewish players caught up in MLB swap market

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — A fair number of Jewish ballplayers were caught up in baseball's swap market prior to the launch of the 2010 Major League season.

The most notable of the wandering Jews is 31-year-old Jason Marquis, a right-handed hurler who this past winter was inked to a two-year pact by the National League's lowly Washington Nationals. Last season he had a respectable campaign with the Colorado Rockies, compiling a 15-13 record and, by today's standards, a decent ERA of 4.04.

He'll be handsomely reimbursed for his travails at $15 million (US) guaranteed, but in his 10th year in the bigs, he's already played for the Braves, Cardinals and Cubs.

Known as one of the top innings-eaters in the majors, Marquis, with his solid two-seam fastball, made the All-Star team in 2009 while pitching 216 innings in 33 games as a starter, thus bringing relief to a team's sometimes overworked bullpen.

At the July 31 deadline last season, pitcher John Grabow was acquired by the Cubs from Pittsburgh, where he had spent most of his big-league career. The 31-year-old left-handed reliever, who has a career total of 324 saves, appeared in 75 games with the two aforementioned teams and had a 3.36 ERA in 72 innings, plus a 3-0 record.

Every team could use a Grabow, who works especially well out of the bullpen with runners on base. The intimidating six-foot-two, 250-pound veteran can still bring heat in the 90s and has a strong change-up and curve. After so many seasons on the mound, the underpaid pitcher is finally being rewarded with the salary he deserves in the Windy City, where keeping the ball in the park is an adventure. He signed a two-year deal for $7.5 million (US).

Craig Breslow, who also earns his money in relief, is a well-travelled 29-year-old who has taken his act to San Diego, Boston, Cleveland, twice to Minnesota and finally last June was dealt to Oakland.

With the Twins and A's last season, the Yale grad boasted a combined ERA of 3.36 in 77 appearances where he worked 70 innings and had a won-lost record of 8-6. Being a left-hander, he's always in demand, since southpaws are always in short supply.

Another lefty, Aaron Poreda, was brought up briefly last year by the White Sox, then traded to the Padres. The 23-year-old reliever is considered a top prospect, and between Chicago and San Diego, he made 14 trips to the mound. In 13 innings, he had an ERA of 2.70.

Texas Rangers' right-hander Scott Feldman thrust himself into the limelight last season by improving on a 2008 mark of 6-8 and an ERA of 5.29 to 17-8 and 4.08 in 2009. Voted team pitcher of the year, the Hawaii-born six-foot-seven giant, who weighs 230 pounds, was a road killer, winning a league-leading 12 games away from home.

The Rangers' Ian Kinsler hit only .253 in 2009, but still managed 31 home runs and drove in 86, which is more than decent production for a second baseman. His most memorable highlight last season occurred on April 16, when Texas upended Baltimore 19-6. Kinsler recorded a feat not accomplished since 1900 when he hit for the cycle (single, double, triple and home run) plus registering an additional two hits to go six for six. He made history on Jackie Robinson Day, named for a fellow second baseman who broke the colour barrier in 1947 with the Brooklyn Dodgers.

Ryan Braun, 26, the first-ever Jewish rookie of the year (2007), had another banner season for the Brewers in 2009. He was the top vote-getter among outfielders for the all-star team, hitting .320 along with 32 homers and 114 RBI. Players of his ilk rarely run the base paths with abandon, but the Hebrew Hammer, as he's been called, pilfered 20 while banging out 203 hits.

Red Sox star Kevin Youkilis, 31, voted the best Jewish player of the last decade (2000-2009), has become one of the most versatile corner infielders in the game. He usually hangs out at first base, but can play third equally well. In 136 games last year, he batted .305 with 27 taters and 94 RBI. A very difficult out for opposing pitchers, he had 77 walks, which helped inflate his total of runs scored to 99.

Also watch for the Dodgers' Brad Ausmus, 40, who is both a backup catcher and mentor. A fine handler of pitchers and strong on defence, he's had more than 6,000 at-bats in his career. Last season, in 39 games, he hit .295.

The Cubs have a speedster in centrefielder Sam Fuld, 28, who may see some action in 2010. In 97 at-bats last year, he hit .299. The Stanford grad played mostly in AAA last season, hitting .284 with Iowa while managing to steal 23 bases and bang out 10 triples.

Also watch for Josh Whitesell, a first baseman in the Washington system, and pitcher Ryan Sadowski with San Francisco. Veteran reliever Mike Koplove is presently in spring training with Seattle, and starting pitcher Jason Hirsh is with the Yankees.

COUGARS REPEAT: The boys hockey team from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy's Kimel Family Education Centre in Vaughan have repeated as York Regional Athletic Association (YRAA) senior Tier 2 hockey champs. The Cougars defeated St. Robert in two games in a best-of-three final. CHAT won the first game, on March 2, 5 to 1 on goals from Aaron Hummel, Harry Lewis, Adam Litwin, and David Garbuz, who scored two. Goaltender Jordan Rostowsky was outstanding. He was strong again in game two on March 4, and the Cougars rallied around him with a four-goal effort to defeat St. Robert 4-1. Goals were scored by Andrew Shore, David Garbuz, again with two, and Adam Litwin.

New Hamilton cantor has 'natural and authentic sound'

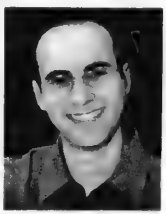
By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — Eyal Bitton remembers sitting at the seder table as a child with all of his cousins itching to get away and watch television.

"I didn't understand. I would never want it to end. I kept singing until I was hoarse. I want others to share that feeling."

That's why the Montreal-born Bitton became a cantor.

A composer and lyricist who has penned several musicals and oratorios, Bitton was musical director of Beth Tikvah Synagogue's choir in Toronto for six years when he decided to become a cantor.



Eyal Bitton

"I was sculpting the services behind the scenes, but it was being expressed by the cantor's voice. I felt I could have more of an impact if I could do it myself," he said.

Bitton took cantorial lessons, and two months later, he applied to an opening at Hamilton's Beth Jacob Synagogue. He started there last September.

Talk about a big debut: Bitton began during the High Holidays.

But because he loves the music of the High Holidays so much, he said his nervousness just fell away.

"They say as a new cantor, you shouldn't change the melodies. I changed dozens, but I felt it worked. The congregation was able to sing along immediately."

Never formally taught music, Bitton, now 40, joined his synagogue choir as a boy. As he got older, he loved pop metal and the rock band Kiss and learned to play the guitar. He started writing songs as a teenager.

"I love pop music because of its energy and simplicity. You hear a new song and you can sing along right away," he said.

This is what Bitton tries to do in his services. He performs a mix of traditional Ashkenazi and Moroccan melodies, along with his own pieces. Once a month, he does a theme service, such as using tunes from Beatles songs or last month's Hollywood theme, which featured songs from television and movies.

"I don't see the cantor as a performer, but as a song and prayer leader. I want to make sure the congregation is participating in the prayers."

Bitton is married to actress-singer Michele Tredger. The two met when she auditioned for him in 1997. They became friends, and five years later, began dating.

Bitton has written the music and lyrics to musicals performed in Toronto, Montreal and Hong Kong. His choral compositions and arrangements have been performed in Ottawa, New York, California and Israel.

In Montreal, he has conducted choirs for the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, Adath Israel Poale Zedek, Jewish People's and Peretz Schools and La Chorale Kinor of the Communauté Sépharade Unifiée du Québec.

Bitton is also education director at Beth Jacob. In addition to the Hebrew program, Glee and Theatrix are new ways of reaching students. Through the Glee club, children learn and perform the music of the Sabbath service. Once a month, in Theatrix, they learn a Bible story and perform a scene.

"It's about instilling passion when they are young, so as an adult, they will thirst for more and seek it out," he said.

Beth Jacob Rabbi Dan Selsberg said Bitton brings a clear sense of energy, focus and drive to his roles as cantor and educator. "His ability to engage the congregation in song is unique among cantors working within a halachic framework," Rabbi Selsberg said.

TZIMMES W/ DRIED CHERRIES & PEACHES

2 butternut squash, medium, peeled, seeded, sliced 1/4" thick
4 potatoes , medium, peeled, each cut into 8 pieces
6 c water (up to 8 if nec)

A Family Business for over 60 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

I'm not Jewish, but I'm trying very hard to fit in with Josh's family. Josh and I have been dating for about eight months, and we're very close. This year, I'm invited to his family's seder, and I'm both excited and nervous. I realize the Passover seder has many rules and restrictions, and I don't want to do anything wrong. Josh's family is somewhat observant, but I don't know to what degree exactly. I'd like to bring a gift with me, and I'd like to know what would be appropriate. I don't know how much to spend, but I would be comfortable in the $25 to $50 range.

I would rather not involve Josh in my decision, as I really want this to be from me for Josh and his family. Any suggestions would be appreciated.

Proper Passover Present

Dear Proper Passover Present

You are very thoughtful and smart to be asking this question, as there are many rules, or halachot, on Jewish holidays, and especially on Passover.

For starters, steer clear of any food items. Most homes are kosher for Passover and bringing anything into the home that would compromise that would be a major faux pas. Stay away from cut flowers as well, unless you have them delivered to the home before the onset of the holiday. Some people will not put cut flowers in water after the onset of the holiday. However, a flower arrangement already in a vase with water or already prearranged would be fine. A bottle of kosher for Passover wine is a nice gift. There are many wines available that are not 21 on the sweet scale. You can ask for help at the liquor store, or go to www.kosherwinereport.com. Make sure the wine says "Kosher for Passover" and "Mevushal".

You may also bring something for the house, such as linens, a serving platter, a bowl or a set of tea towels. Watch the wrapping, though, as many people won't tear paper after the holiday begins, so use a gift bag instead.

A charitable donation in their honour would also be appropriate. Some organizations have fundraisers geared to Passover. Mazon Canada sells Passover placemats, Ve'ahavta has an annual seder for the homeless.

It's clear this is very meaningful to you. Your heart is in the right place. Relax and enjoy.

The power of 'gracious language'

"Only a life of goodness and honesty leaves us feeling spiritually healthy and human."– Rabbi Harold Kushner

Life Coach Corner

By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

Being good is the single most important key to finding your bliss. Goodness and kindness always make you happy.

We are all given choices every day to act with kindness and goodness. I think it's easier to choose being good, not only because it feels good, but in fact, as Hal Urban says in Life's Greatest Lessons, "There's a relationship between old-fashioned goodness and our health and well-being. Sadly, too many people never see it.

"What do I mean by old-fashioned goodness? I mean living by the great moral values that have been with us since God created the world... And being good is the most essential ingredient of emotional and spiritual health."

The language that we use and what we put out there is so important. As Urban writes, "The wise Solomon wrote thousands of years ago that only gracious words come from the mouths of wise people and that fools are consumed by their own lips. We'd all be wise to examine more closely what our words are uncovering about us."

There are positive ways that we can communicate with others that make us feel good and make others feel good. Urban says they are "praise, sincere compliments, encouragement, thanks, truth, belief and trust, sympathy, humour and laughing with someone not at them, advice, sharing of good news, greetings and support."

The negative ways we communicate are "put-downs, swearing, biting sarcasm, name-calling, laughing at, complaining, gossip and rumour, yelling, insincere flattery, insults, lying and manipulating and blaming others."

In studies that Urban did with college students, he determined that more negatives come out of some people's mouths than positives.

So he talks about "gracious language" and how important it is.

"I began to notice the people I most admired consistently used words that were positive and pleasant to hear. Good people are sensitive enough to choose their words carefully. What comes out of our mouths does indeed reveal what's stored in our hearts."

Affirming others feels good, too, There is a lovely exercise that Urban taught in a psychology course where he put a chair in the middle of the room and they called it the hot seat. Each student got to sit in that seat and had to tell everyone "what's good about me." Urban wanted his students to be able to acknowledge their positive characteristics and habits.

The second part of the exercise was that the students in the semicircle had to tell the person in the hot seat what he or she left out. So the person in the hot seat listened to compliments and praise for several minutes.

This exercise had a positive effect on everyone in the room, not only the recipients of the praise.

As Urban says, "there's a lot more good in people than there is bad. We need to get into the habit of looking for what's good in others. Building people up is much more effective than tearing them down. It feels good to make someone else feel good. Affirmation brings out the best in people. Everybody wins!"

Life, hope, freedom

Editorial

The infant babies in the above photo are identical twins. The names their mother gave them are Vladimir and Daniel, presumably after the two doctors who helped her bring them safely into the world.

Her world at the time was one of rubble, chaos and massive death in Haiti. The doctors were from Israel, part of the Israel Defence Forces' medical and rescue team that rushed to the stricken Caribbean island last January to help find, heal and restore life amid the horrific devastation that killed nearly 200,000 people.

Vladimir and Daniel are two months old today. The IDF medical team literally helped give them life.

The little boy in the inset photo, wearing pyjamas and a hospital patient's hairnet, is six years old. His name is Woodley Elysee.

Doctors at the pediatric department of the Wolfson Medical Center in Holon, Israel, last month repaired a congenital defect in the young boy's heart that would likely have taken his life before he turned 12.

Woodley was brought to Israel by the IDF's medical team in Haiti, in co-operation with Israel's Save A Child's Heart program, which provides lifesaving surgeries for children from developing countries.

Woodley is well on his way now to a full recovery.

Dr. Sion Houri, director of pediatric intensive care at the hospital told the Jerusalem Post last month that Woodley "will not have much when he returns to Haiti, but he will be able to breathe, grow and play soccer."

In fact, however, Woodley will have far more than Houri suggested.

He will have life itself – and with that life, the hope of a better future, the hope of possibilities beyond the devastation that he has already witnessed and the poverty that he has already experienced.

And so, too, will many of Woodley's fellow Haitians.

During their nearly two-week stay in Haiti, the Israeli medical teams treated nearly 1,000 patients, conducted some 300 successful surgeries and delivered 16 babies. In addition, the IDF rescue teams saved scores of individuals by retrieving them alive from the devastation.

On the eve of Passover, it is timely and important to recall the simple, plain truths of what the IDF accomplished for the people of Haiti, for Passover is the celebration of freedom. And what freedom can there be without life? What life can there be without hope?

The News in Brief

CANADA

Actor Laid To Rest

TORONTO — Actor Corey Haim was buried March 16 in a private Jewish ceremony in Toronto attended by some 200 relatives and friends. The ex-teen heart-throb, who gained fame in the 1980s in films such as The Lost Boys and Lucas, died March 10 at the Los Angeles home he shared with his Israeli-born mother. The Toronto-born Haim, 38, had an enlarged heart, pulmonary congestion and water in his lungs. An autopsy has yet to confirm cause of death, but police in Los Angeles speculated about a drug overdose. Haim, who was open about his struggle with drugs and alcohol, started acting as a child after his mother enrolled him in drama classes to help him overcome shyness.

WORLD

Shul Opening Nixed

CAIRO — Egypt cancelled the official opening of a restored Cairo synagogue over what it called Jewish "provocative" actions. The formal opening of the 19th-century Maimonides Synagogue, which was renovated by the Egyptian government, had been scheduled for March 14. But the event was cancelled at the last minute after reports that during a Jewish community ceremony this month to mark the reopening, there was "dancing and drinking alcohol in the synagogue," antiquities chief Zahi Hawass was quoted as saying. The decision was also made at "a time when Muslim holy sites in occupied Palestine face assaults from Israeli occupation forces and settlers," Hawass said, French news agency AFP reported.

Shul Opening Marked

BERLIN — More than 70 years after its synagogue was destroyed by Nazi rioters in 1938, the German town of Herford dedicated a new Jewish house of worship. In a March 14 ceremony Sunday, local and national Jewish leaders and clergy joined to unveil the new structure, which will serve the 106-member community – 90 per cent of whom are immigrants from the former Soviet Union. Four rabbis carried a Torah scroll into the sanctuary as Cantor Jacow Zelewitsch chanted Ma Tovu and Rabbi Shimon Grossberg of Osnabruck lit the eternal light. The community does not yet have a rabbi. The new synagogue cost about $2.7 million, one-third of which was borne by the German government.

Arms Deal Secured

SYDNEY, Australia — An Israeli defence company won a $300-million contract to develop a cutting-edge command and communications system for the Australian Defense Force. The Haifa-based Elbit Systems, one of the world's largest defence electronics makers, won the international tender, Australian Defence Personnel Minister Greg Combet said March 16. The new equipment, to be deployed fully by 2012, will "automate combat messaging" and "significantly reduce" deaths from friendly fire, he said. Elbit's CEO predicted the project would lead to more contracts from other foreign armies.

Former Mayor Leads Dutch Polls For PM

AMSTERDAM — Opinion polls in the Netherlands show that a majority of voters favour the Jewish former mayor of Amsterdam for prime minister.

Marius Job Cohen

Some 52 per cent of those polled earlier this month said they'd vote for Marius Job Cohen as prime minister in national elections scheduled for June, the European Jewish Press reported.

Cohen, 62, was selected from a list that included current Prime Minister Jan Peter Balkenende and extreme-right, anti-Islam campaigner Geert Wilders.

Cohen, a former law professor and mayor of Amsterdam for nine years, from 2001 to 2010, was chosen the new leader of the Dutch Labour Party on March 12.

Palin Scolds Obama

WASHINGTON — Sarah Palin called on the Obama administration to mend relations with Israel. Referring to this month's gaffe in which new construction in east Jerusalem was announced during U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden's visit, the former U.S. Republican vice-presidential candidate and Alaska governor said in a statement that the Obama administration chose "to escalate a minor incident into a major diplomatic confrontation." Palin criticized President Barack Obama for making demands of Israel while not requiring Arab leaders to make equally demanding concessions.

MPPs get hate mail for IAW resolution

Conservative, Bloc motions in Ottawa fail to receive all-party support

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Peter Shurman won't reveal the most offensive hate messages he received as a result of sponsoring a resolution in the Ontario legislature opposing Israel Apartheid Week (IAW). One, however, was addressed to the "Minister of Kikes" while in another, the writer spat on the graves of him and his family.

If those were far from the worst message he received, what were the really atrocious ones like?

"I've been called every expletive in the book," the Progressive Conservative MPP for Thornhill, stated.

None have been explicitly threatening, but he's notified the security force at the legislature about the messages.

NDP representative Cheri DiNovo, however, did receive threats, Shurman said. DiNovo was out of the country and unavailable for comment last week.

"My intent was always to cause a ripple," Shurman said of the resolution adopted unanimously in the legislature, "but I didn't intend this kind of response."

Shurman said in using his annual allocation of 12 minutes of private member's time to propose the resolution, he was challenging proponents of IAW to open up discussions of the Middle East conflict.

As things stand now, "they start with the premise that Israel is an apartheid state and that leaves no room for debate."

"If they want a reasonable debate, they should style it Middle East peace week," he suggested. "That's not the case for IAW."

"I said enough was enough. I have a constituency, Thornhill, a good portion of which is Jewish, who say we find this intimidating and not promoting respect," he said.

Peter Shurman

Shurman's resolution states "that in the opinion of this house, the term 'Israel Apartheid Week' is condemned as it serves to incite hatred against Israel, a democratic state that respects the rule of law and human rights, and the use of the word 'apartheid' in this context diminishes the suffering of those who were victims of a true apartheid regime in South Africa."

Shurman speculated that DiNovo attracted real threats because in supporting the resolution, "she broke ranks" with the left. The NDP, he suggested, gets support from the left "which has been behind an awful lot of the negativity to Israel and uses the term apartheid."

In Ottawa, meanwhile, Conservative MP Tim Uppal introduced a motion that also condemned IAW. It stated: "That this House considers itself to be a friend of the State of Israel; that this House is concerned about expressions of anti-Semitism under the guise of Israeli Apartheid Week; and that this House explicitly condemns any action in Canada as well as internationally that would equate the State of Israel with the rejected and racist policy of apartheid."

Getting ready for Passover

It has been the tradition of this column each year on the eve of the celebration of Pesach to write about newly published Haggadot.

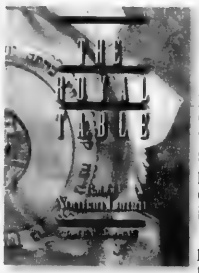
It is a privilege to maintain that tradition.

The Royal Table (OU Press) brings the insights, observations and considerable wisdom of Rabbi Norman Lamm to our Passover table and, of course, beyond.

From the editor's desk...

Rabbi Lamm is the chancellor of Yeshiva University and rosh yeshiva of its affiliated Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary. He served for many years as rabbi of the Jewish Center, in Manhattan and as president and rosh yeshiva (head of the yeshiva – one could say, headmaster) of Yeshiva University.

His renown as a scholar, educator, writer and pulpit rabbi extend throughout the world.



A rare thinker of his times for his generation, Rabbi Lamm's Torah is a wide field encompassing all aspects of life that affect and deal with the many inevitably piercing or pleasant aspects of the human condition. His writing is founded upon the classic scholars of our traditions. Secure in his place within the thousand years of foundational scholarship, Rabbi Lamm adds to, expands upon, extends and augments our understanding of the meanings of the words that we recite each year with and for our family and friends around the seder table.

Ever the educator, Rabbi Lamm ensures that the table is as much for teaching and learning as it is for eating and reciting the story of the Exodus.

Rabbi Lamm explains the reason for the name of this particular Haggadah. It is the key that opens the door to his teacher's room. He seizes upon the multiple meanings for the phrase in classic Jewish sources.

"The table is prominently mentioned in the Talmud as that on which the seder narrative is played out. And it is royal because the participants conduct themselves as victors in the ancient battle not only with the Egyptians but with others over the generations.

"It is also a term for food of the finest quality and... Conversely, it was used to express contempt for crude class consciousness.

"If indeed The Royal Table implies two opposites, then it fits right in with the dialectical experience [my emphasis] of Passover and especially its major symbol, the matzah."

It is therefore the inescapable dialectic imperative of the teacher constantly trying to refine the point, investigating, reconciling opposites, pointing out or squaring contradictions that we read in The Royal Table.

As Pesach is – by its purpose and by its nature – the quintessential teaching moment, Rabbi Lamm's observations are a perfect accompaniment to that, now, millennial moment.

The Royal Table was edited and compiled by Joel B. Wolowelsky using material from Rabbi Lamm's sermons, divrei Torah and relevant selections from the rabbi's written works.

Wolowelsky is himself a significant scholar and educator in the modern Jewish world. Dean of the faculty at the Yeshiva of Flatbush, he is also associate editor of Tradition and the series MeOtzar HoRav: Selected Writings of Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik. He is a member of various professional advisory boards, including the Bar Ilan University Lookstein Center for Jewish Education in the Diaspora, the Boston Initiative for Excellence in Jewish Day Schools, the Pardes Educators Program in Jerusalem, and Atid: the Academy for Torah Initiatives and Directions.

The Royal Table is a welcome new arrival for the seder table this year.

For younger participants at the seder table, there is also the enthusiastic, cheery, playful and thoughtful new CD from the extremely talented Israeli-American music therapist Dafna Israel-Kotok called Halilah Hazeh!.

Israel-Kotok is the originator of Shir Fun, an excitingly innovative approach to early childhood education and development. Its very name bespeaks its clever, fresh, novelty.

"Shir," in Hebrew, means song. And, of course, in English, it has a very clear homonymic meaning, too. Thus we have "Song Fun" or "Sheer Fun." Either way, for the listener, it is both a promise and a fulfilment.

Israel-Kotok has a deeply pleasing voice, distinctive and original, and at times, at least to this listener, also evocative of stylistic and substantive echoes of the "huskier" singer Carol King and remarkably, too, of the laser clarity of Joan Baez.

The CD will delight listeners of all ages. It contains original and traditional tunes of and for the seder. It will bring many smiles to the faces and to the hearts of those who listen to it and who, inevitably, will also sing happily along.

BAN REMINDED OF SCHALIT

Israelis urged United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon to seek Gilad Schalit's freedom from the Hamas leadership in Gaza. As Ban traveled last week into the Gaza Strip, he was met by Israelis protesting the continued imprisonment of the young Israeli soldier. Schalit's father, Noam, met Sunday in Jerusalem with Ban, who expressed sympathy for his plight.

UJA Federation initiative helps Jews worldwide

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

While shopping for groceries, Karen Levy began to worry – not for herself, but for her community.

"When I saw the price of Pesach food this year… I thought, 'How do people in large families with low incomes shop for Pesach?,'" Levy, 40, said. "I don't know how people do it – how they put their kids in day school and how they're able to make a seder for their family."

That's why when she learned about the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Global Seder initiative, she didn't hesitate to give.

The program, called the Global Seder to Fight Hunger, collects money for Jewish communities in Toronto, Cuba, Israel and the former Soviet Union in order to buy Passover food for those in need.

Contributors can choose where their money goes, something Levy appreciated.

"What grabbed me about it the most is the fact that it was an opportunity to put your support in a specific place. It was a global thing, but you could pick where your donation went to," she said, adding that she chose to donate to Toronto's Jewish community.

"I think oftentimes, our own get forgotten. At a time like this, we need to remember our own struggles within our community. It's a local problem as well as a global problem."

Steven Shulman, federation's campaign director and counsel, agrees.

"We do have people in communities all around the world – our community, in Cuba, Jews in the former Soviet Union and Israel– that are in need, particularly around Passover," he said.

The federation chose to support areas where there's a means of distributing funds. The organization has already been involved in helping Jewish communities internationally with initiatives such as delivering Pesach food to the Cuban Jews.

"There's no holiday where food is more central than at Passover," Shulman said. "The thing we want people to think about is how much would it cost to bring one person around your seder table. How much would it cost for a family?"

According to the federation's website, $30 will pay for one person's Passover meal, and $100 will pay for a family's meal.

For Shulman, the Global Seder helps Torontonians connect to Jews worldwide.

"Right away, there's a connection to the fate of Jews who may be thousands of miles away, or, in some cases, only metres away. It could be a neighbour," he said. "There's the feeling of one Jewish people. It creates Jewish unity."

Len Rudner, Ontario regional director of Canadian Jewish Congress, noted that in Canada, "we're blessed.

"We have so much. The challenge that many of us face in Canada isn't a question of where are we going to get our kosher food," he said.

Congress will be involved in the Global Seder initiative by helping Cuban Jews, who have trouble finding kosher food.

"We're all responsible for one another. I think we sometimes forget that," he said. "It's good sometimes to have someone… ask you to consider the view on the wider horizon… [This] makes us better Jews, better people."

For more information or to donate to the Global Seder, visit www.globalseder.com. Donations will be accepted until Passover.

We celebrate freedom

Freedom barren of hope is also barren of purpose and meaning.

The philosopher proves his existence with the syllogism: "I think, therefore I am."

The Jew more aptly says: "I hope, therefore I am."

Hope has been the guiding beacon throughout all the days of our history, starting of course with the epic event that we relive at the seder and that was the beginning of the history of our peoplehood: the Exodus from Egypt.

Retelling the story of our freedom is thus also an appropriate occasion for reflecting upon the importance of hope in fashioning our collective character and in constantly steering forward the unchanging millennial imperative to build a better world.

Over the years, not surprisingly, many peoples have appropriated the story of the Exodus as a paradigm and an inspiration for the idea of liberation. But we must never forget that the Exodus from Egypt is more than a paradigm. It is, first and foremost, the story of the liberation of an actual people: the Jewish People.

Passover celebrates that story.

The ancient Romans tried to obliterate our story – Jewish history – even to the point, after destroying the Second Temple, of obliterating the very name of the land, Judea, from which the term "Jew" derives, and replacing it with the name Palestina.

But they failed.

Jews and the Jewish People are very much alive and active in history. The ancient Romans and their empire, it should be pointed out, are not.

But there are others today who try to obliterate Jewish history.

For example, two weeks ago, Khaled Meshal, the political leader of Hamas in Damascus, described the reopening of the Hurva synagogue in the Jewish Quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem as "a declaration of war, part of a project to destroy the Al-Aqsa Mosque and replace it with Israel's so-called Solomon's Temple. Israel is playing with fire and touching off the first spark to make the region explode," he said. Meshal's diatribe was repeated in kind and in tone by the more "moderate" Fatah official, Khatem Abd el-Kadr.

What Meshal and el-Kadr said, of course, was absolutely and totally false.

The Hurva synagogue was completed in 1864 by Jews and destroyed in 1948 by the Jordanian army. Indeed, between 1948 and 1967, Jordanian forces destroyed some 58 synagogues in the Jewish Quarter and some 38,000 Jewish tombstones on the Mount of Olives.

Like the ancient Romans before them, these Palestinians, too, will fail in their efforts to obliterate Jewish history.

We conclude the ritual portion of the Passover seder with the words that have stirred the hopes of the Jewish people for more than 2,000 years: "L'shanah haba'ah b'Yerushalayim (hab'nuyah)." "Next year in (rebuilt) Jerusalem."

Od lo avdah tikvateinu. We have not lost our hope. Nor will we ever. For that is the beating heart of our freedom. On Passover, we celebrate that freedom.

25 years ago in The CJN

Convicted Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel was sentenced in Toronto to 15 months in jail, followed by three years probation, for publishing the pamphlet Did Six Million Really Die? As part of his probation, he was banned from publishing or speaking about the Holocaust, or any subject directly or indirectly related to it.

Students, parents not consulted

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto spokesperson Howard English claims that "a wide variety of stakeholders" are being consulted before it finalizes its report on Jewish education ("Draft report released on Jewish education," March 18). It is not surprising, however, that federation, in preparing the first draft, has failed once again to consult with the very constituency that is most impacted by any decisions that may be made as a result of this report, namely, the students and the parents of the thousands of children currently in our Jewish educational system.

Several of the parent leaders who have tirelessly volunteered their time, energy and money to advance the cause of Jewish education were similarly not consulted in the preparation of the first, and arguably the most critical, draft. This despite federation's stated desire to be more accountable and transparent to the community that it serves and the fact that we parents collectively spend millions each year to educate our children. I have no doubt that perpetuating this approach to communal affairs will ultimately fail if federation continues to exclude parent leaders while our tuitions continue to significantly rise on an annual basis, and parents increasingly seek alternatives to the prohibitively high cost of Jewish education.

Yeshiva for learning disabled needed

Toronto, with its large Orthodox community, doesn't have a yeshiva at high school level staffed by special education rabbis or an integrated high school-level program in another yeshiva where our children can learn Torah. The Jewish high school that does offer special education has a mixture of boys and girls, and for many parents, this is not an option

Students with learning disabilities are of average intelligence or higher but have an impairment in one or more processes related to perceiving, thinking, remembering or learning. Many of them aren't able to cope with the intensity and pace of a regular yeshiva, and in the end, they can easily throw their Yiddishkeit away as a result of their failure. Some parents send their children to small yeshivot in the United States that take students who don't fit into other yeshivot.

The financial burden placed on the parents and the risk they take by sending these vulnerable teenagers away from their families is great. Could we imagine if Moses were here today and he would not be accepted in our yeshivot because of his speech impediment? This is not far from what is happening today, because nobody can really judge which Jewish soul is better than another.

A yeshiva staffed by special education rabbis and teachers may be opening in Toronto next year.The curriculum will include Gemarah, halachot and accredited English subjects, and have a vocational element. For more information, contact me at 416-836-4421 or e-mail da300@rogers.com.

Campus anti-Semitism

Avrum Jacobson is making the mistake of thinking that current attempts in our universities to delegitimize the State of Israel have a rational basis and can be alleviated by changes in Israel's behaviour ("IAW would wither away if…" March 11, letters). He just doesn't get it! These attacks are clearly nothing more than old-fashioned, irrational anti-Semitism, now disguising itself as legitimate political action. The ultimate goal of Israeli Apartheid Week is not a separate Palestinian state. It is the eradication of the Jewish one.

Political change and language

I was pleased to see that The CJN spells the "east" of "east Jerusalem" with a small "e." Virtually all other media spell it incorrectly as "East Jerusalem," as if it were already a separate entity. Political change begins with language, and the media pave the way.

To prove the point, consider that nowhere today does anyone in the media refer to "disputed territory." It's always "occupied territory," and hence the Jewish claim is lost.

What about Palestinian incitement?

By AMI EDEN
JTA

In response to the Obama administration's stepped-up criticism of Israeli building plans in Jerusalem, Jewish groups criticized the White House for failing to speak out more against Palestinian incitement.

Particularly galling, several Jewish organizational leaders said, is that the administration has ratcheted up its criticism of Israel while failing to utter a word about the decision of the Palestinian Authority to go through with plans to name a public square in Ramallah after Dalal Mughrabi, a terrorist who led a 1978 bus hijacking in which 37 Israelis, including 12 children, were killed.

Earlier this month, pro-Israel organizations, including the watchdog group Palestinian Media Watch, pointed out that the official naming ceremony – timed to coincide with the anniversary of the terrorist attack – was set to take place March 11, during U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden's visit to Israel and the Palestinian territories.

It was quickly announced that the ceremony would be cancelled, but a scaled-down version of the event did end up taking place that day, with the youth division of Fatah, the faction of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, playing a lead role.

The White House and left-wing Jewish groups say they're as concerned with Palestinian actions that undermine the peace process, especially the issue of anti-Israel incitement, as they are with Israeli settlement policies. But several centrist and right-wing pro-Israel groups have pointed out that U.S. criticism in recent days has been focused exclusively on Israel.

"This monstrous spectacle" – the ceremony for Mughrabi – "took place while Vice-President Biden was visiting the region," said the executive director of the American Jewish Committee, David Harris, in a statement, echoing the sentiments of several Jewish organizations, including the Zionist Organization of America, the Orthodox Union and the National Council of Young Israel. "Unfortunately, we have not heard a single word of condemnation from the U.S. administration.

"While the administration has focused its ire on Israel for clearly misguided steps taken by the Ministry of the Interior, and later apologized for by Prime Minister [Benjamin] Netanyahu, the glorification of this terrorist sends a clear signal that Fatah, conventionally regarded as a moderate party, has no serious commitment to securing a peaceful resolution of the conflict."

J Street, which supports the Obama administration's recent criticisms of Israel, also issued a statement condemning the decision to memorialize Mughrabi.

In addition to the flurry of statements from Jewish groups, the Israeli government also is promising to launch an official effort to monitor Palestinian incitement. Earlier this month, Netanyahu reportedly briefed the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee about his plans, promising regular reports on the issue.

"We will set parameters by which to measure the level of incitement," Netanyahu told the committee, according to Ha'aretz. "People must know exactly what is happening on this issue, because for a peace agreement, education toward peace and acceptance of Israel are needed."

The issue has taken on added urgency in recent days, and not just because of the unrelenting U.S. criticism of Israeli building plans in Jerusalem.

On March 16, Palestinians rioted in Jerusalem as part of a "day of rage" declared by Hamas, in part to protest the rededication the previous night of the ancient Hurva Synagogue in the Jewish Quarter of the Old City of Jerusalem. But the Israeli decision to rededicate the synagogue also was seized on by PA officials with ties to Fatah, who attempted to portray it as part of a plot against Muslim holy sites on the Temple Mount.

Khatem Abd el-Kader, the Fatah official responsible for Jerusalem, encouraged Palestinians to "converge on Al Aqsa to save it" from "Israeli attempts to destroy the mosque and replace it with the [Jewish] temple." He called the synagogue rededication a "provocation," cautioning that Israel is "playing with fire."

The unfinished Hurva Synagogue, whose name means ruins, was destroyed in an Arab riot in 1721. It was rebuilt in the 1860s, but destroyed again after Jordan took control of the area in the 1948 war.

"At this very moment, 3,000 Israeli security officials are protecting Jerusalem, because extremist Arabs are using the rededication of the Hurva Synagogue as an excuse to incite violence," Jennifer Laszlo Mizrahi, president of the Israel Project, said in a statement. "Not once did we hear Biden 'condemn' the fact that Palestinians were planning – during his trip there – to honour a terrorist by dedicating a town square in her name."

On March 15, U.S. State Department spokesperson P.J. Crowley did use part of his daily media briefing to criticize Palestinian leaders over their comments regarding the Hurva Synagogue.

"We're deeply disturbed by statements made by several Palestinian officials mischaracterizing the event in question, which can only serve to heighten the tensions that we see. And we call upon Palestinian officials to put an end to such incitement," Crowley said, without prompting.

In answer to a subsequent question, he said the concerns had been conveyed to Palestinian officials but declined to offer more details.

The briefing appeared to validate at least one administration lament – that its efforts to focus attention on perceived Palestinian misdeeds are often ignored by the media. Reporters appeared to have trouble comprehending that the U.S. State Department's concerns related to the Palestinian reactions, not the Israeli decision to rededicate the synagogue.

When it finally became clear that this is what Crowley was saying, reporters went back to asking about U.S. upset with Israel, but only after one accused Crowley of trying to head off criticism of the Obama administration by balancing out things with a complaint about the Palestinians.

You can't make artificial peace, Lieberman says

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman responded last Friday to the Quartet of Middle East peace mediators' call to relaunch Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations, saying that peace isn't something that can be created artificially and with unrealistic timetables.

"Peace will be established through actions and not by force," Lieberman told Belgium's Jewish community ahead of his scheduled talks with the ministers of several European nations.

"The Quartet [Russia, the United States, the United Nations and the European Union] is ignoring the last 16 years of Israeli attempts, and is giving the Palestinians the impression that they can achieve their demands by continuing to refuse direct negotiations under false pretexts," Lieberman said.

"The Israeli government has made many significant gestures. Now it's the Palestinian's turn to prove that they are really interested in negotiations," Lieberman added.

The Quartet called on Israel and the Palestinians to renew peace talks in order to achieve a two-state solution within 24 months. Quartet representatives met in Moscow last Friday in an effort to defuse the latest crisis in peace efforts between Israel and the Palestinians.

"The Quartet believes these negotiations should lead to a settlement, negotiated between the parties within 24 months, that ends the occupation that began in 1967 and results in the emergence of an independent, democratic and viable Palestinian state living side by side in peace and security with Israel and its other neighbours," said a joint statement read by UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon.

"The Quartet reiterates that Arab-Israeli peace and the establishment of a peaceful state of Palestine in the West Bank and Gaza is in the fundamental interest of the parties, of all states in the region, and of the international community," the statement said. "In this regard the Quartet calls on all states to support dialogues between the parties."

The mediators also called on Israel following their meeting to freeze all settlement activities and denounced its recent decision to approve construction of 1,600 new homes in east Jerusalem.

Opinions

Recall the MIAs

Passover celebrates the Exodus of the Jews from Egypt. They were slaves. God promised liberation. Moses led them to freedom. That combination of acts and facts has been celebrated by Jewish families and communities through the ages.

Sarona Baumel Josephi in Montreal

But what does it mean to us today? We organize our households, buy tons of special foods, eat matzah, and spend some quality time with family. In what way do these activities speak to the themes of that story, of liberation from slavery?

Don't get me wrong. I engage in and endorse all of these activities. I love Passover. I love the food, the family and the fun. To me, it's the best holiday of the year, despite the hard work. We tell the story, we ask questions and we encourage the children. Great! But where is the theme of liberation? How do we pledge redemption?

Many of us believe in making our holidays relevant. We bring in discussions of important issues and interpretations that help elucidate and illustrate. Some of us add passages about the Shoah to help teach about persecution and freedom. Others add sections about the Refuseniks and the Jewish effort to liberate our people from Soviet constraints and confinements. Many celebrate women's suffering and leadership with Miriam's cup.

Freedom is a fragile thing. It requires constant protection and vigilance. Living in our society, we take it for granted. We can't imagine life without it. But we must try to. The Haggadah itself tells us that we should tell the story as if we ourselves were there in Egypt.

So we try. But it's hard. This year, we have an added charge. We have children, sons imprisoned – young people in need of our redemptive prayers and acts. They're called MIAs, soldiers missing in action. Boys who were willing to give their lives for their country, but their country abandoned them.

If Passover teaches us anything, it's the obligation to follow God's lead, to practise and participate in redemptive acts. Gilad Schalit must be on our and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's priority lists. Shas should not be sneaking in new settlements. Instead, they all should be first and foremost arguing everywhere for Gilad, for the MIAs. Everywhere and always. Redemption. Liberation. Those are our obligations.

This Passover, talk and teach about our heritage and history. Insert the issue of our kidnapped and missing soldiers. Feel their bondage. Inculcate the commitment to freedom. Motivate your children to fight for liberation. Feel the link to the parents of the MIAs. They are our people. Don't abandon them. In this our season of liberation, keep them in your hearts.

Let's scrub away outmoded ideas this Pesach

It's time once again to clean our closets, get out the Passover dishes, order food, kasher the stove and sink and check for chametz.

Most importantly, it's time to look into our Haggadot and retell the foundation story of our people: liberation from slavery in Egypt.

Jenna M. Gerber in Vancouver

In my cleaning process, I discovered the following quote (alas, without ascription):

"The dominant or collective memory of a society is not always (perhaps not even often) based on historical fact, but on a set of assumptions about what the past was like."

Let's examine those assumptions by returning to those thrilling days of yesteryear after the first seder and imagine what it was like at the edge of the Reed Sea.

Moses:"OK, men-folk, line up here. Don't crowd. Everybody will get through. Show your tribal ID card – Reuven, don't be so pushy. You and Shimon there, make room for Benjamin. No sneaking in front. Levi, can't you control your sons?"

"Whoa there, little lady, where do you think you are going?"

Small girl: "Well, I'm a bat Levi. Why can't I go with my father? And why is Ima so far back in line?"

Moses: "Listen it's like this. The menfolk do all the heavy lifting. Um, well, they do the davening, you see, and so, well, you and your Ima just have to wait your turn – in fact wait over there behind those bushes. Just keep out of sight."

Ima arrives. "Just a minute, Moses, may I remind you that we are the ones who made sure there was a next generation when the men were ready to separate themselves and stop having children. And just in case you think we're going to stand at the back of the line, you have another think coming. We prepared the seder. We're worthy of that great miracle just like…"

Moses cuts her off: "Sorry, Ma'am, but women just are not ready/safe/smart enough/ holy and pure/ equal to men. So just go back to the women's section behind that wall and don't make any more trouble. Now, men…"

Stop for a moment! Of course no one told the women they had to stand aside. Everyone ate the Passover meal, crossed the Sea of Reeds, stood at Sinai, and all Israel – men, women and children – were worthy of receiving the Torah, all bound by its command to become a "kingdom of priests, a holy nation."

Louis Ginsberg, in Legends of the Jews, wrote: "The dividing of the sea was but the first of 10 miracles connected with the passage of the Israelites through it… 12 paths opened up, one for each of the tribes; the water became as transparent as glass, and each tribe could see the others."

So, those who came to the sea were able to cross it without hindrance, all equal and in plain sight, men and women alike.

Fast forward to 2009-2010. Women are arrested in Israel for davening in tallitot at the Kotel. This place, which belongs to all the Jewish people, has become a battleground. Women are abused and stoned – required to wrap themselves not in a garment of prayer, but a rag of shame – and hauled off to prison.

Is this the message that Pesach teaches us? That some are more equal than others? That only half of the Israelite nation was worthy of redemption?

Ginsberg continued: " The great wonder of Israel's passage through the sea took place in the presence of the three fathers and the six mothers, for God had fetched them… to be witnesses of the marvellous deeds wrought on behalf of their children."

That's two mothers to each father, folks.

This year at our seder, we will remember the miracles that God did for all of us, as well as those women who kept hope alive in the darkness of oppression, saved baby Moses from death, and crossed the sea to freedom beside the men. Maybe even in Israel, the same will some day be true.

Our history should be acknowledged in its entirety. We must avoid assumptions that reflect a narrow interpretation and suit a particular ideology.

The message of Passover

As we gather with relatives, friends and perhaps even strangers at our household and community seders, we are reminded of the historical significance of Passover and our ancestors' quest for freedom in the face of oppression, bondage and slavery.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

This central message of Pesach spans the generations and rings acutely in the modern world. To borrow the language of the Supreme Court of Canada in a number of freedom of expression cases under our Charter of Rights, one of the hallmarks of freedom is the notion of opportunities for individual self-fulfilment and human flourishing. Human flourishing is suppressed when we are victims of bigotry, discrimination and repression. All peoples strive for freedom, emancipation and choice in order to live happier, more satisfying and productive lives.

The Exodus Decoded, a 2006 documentary by Canadian Simcha Jacobovici and American director James Cameron, dissects the events in the book of Exodus. Through historic, scientific and computerized reconstruction, the film attempts to prove the veracity of the events set out in the book of Exodus.

Does the film, the subject of much analysis and debate, accomplish its objective to explain logically the 10 plagues, the opening of the Sea of Reeds and the surreal happenings we read about each year?

Although the filmmakers, biblical scholars and scientists studied the story of Pesach and put forward their theories in a thought-provoking and entertaining way, it is not particularly important to prove the truth of the events. What we should care about is the message of Pesach and how it has resonated through so many generations and how it remains of significance today.

Every year, Jews remember the Holocaust, marking Yom Hashoah, Kristallnacht and Holocaust Remembrance Week. Recently, the Jewish communities across Canada marked a Darfur Shabbat. As a national community sensitive to and caring about genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity, we took action to exert influence in order to stop the horrendous slaughter of innocents in the Sudan. Even in times of natural disasters, such as the recent earthquake in Haiti, our community generously raised money to assist in the disaster relief and reconstruction efforts in that tiny impoverished nation.

All of these activities share the common purpose of advancing the cause of freedom: be it our own freedom after the Holocaust in Europe, the freedom of others who face similar inhumane suffering in other parts of the world or the freedom from challenges beyond our control such as earthquakes, tsunamis and other natural disasters.

The quest for freedom, the central message of Passover, was immortalized in an African-American spiritual inspiring those who were struggling to free themselves from the yoke of slavery. The lyrics include this verse: "When Israel was in Egypt's land/Let my people go/ Oppress'd so hard they could not stand,/ Let my people go./ Go down, Moses,/ Way down in Egypt land/ Tell old Pharaoh,/ Let my people go."

These words and the words in our Haggadah are relevant today. It is not necessary to decode the book of Exodus – the message is loud and clear. Human suffering, oppression, bigotry, discrimination and violence are antithetical to freedom.

In Canada, we enjoy many freedoms, including the freedom to live, practise and conduct our lives in accordance with the values and principles treasured in our religious tradition. At Pesach, as we relive our journey from slavery to freedom, we should consider and confront present-day affronts to freedom while we celebrate and appreciate the many freedoms that we enjoy.

The Canadian Jewish Congress, the voice of Canada's organized Jewish community, has always acted as a vehicle for Jewish advocacy, serving the interests of Canadian Jewry in the ongoing fight against, for example, anti-Semitism and other assaults on our community. But Congress is also well known as an effective human rights organization. That is why it leads our campaign to end the genocide in Darfur. Congress, as a representative organization of our community, and we, as individuals, stand on guard in seeking freedom for all who are oppressed.

That is the message of Pesach. That is the Exodus decoded.

The Kirshner File

Israel and the U.S. were on a collision course

About a month before Israel's pivotal relationship with the United States suddenly deteriorated, Danny Ayalon, Israel's former ambassador to Washington and currently its deputy foreign minister, complacently observed that relations had "never been better." In light of recent events, Ayalon's comment now seems curiously out of touch with reality.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

But even before Washington upbraided Israel for announcing plans to build 1,600 housing units in Ramat Shlomo in eastern Jerusalem – a decision that embarrassed visiting U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden and "undermined" the prospect of renewing talks with the Palestinians, according to President Barack Obama's senior policy adviser, David Axelrod – an alarming degree of tension had crept into Israeli-American relations, though there was never any question that Israel's strategic ties with the United States were threatened.

Since his election victory, Obama has been consistently clear, describing America's bond with Israel as "unbreakable," but insisting that Israel has to acknowledge the "legitimate grievances and interests of the Palestinians" within a two-state solution. And in a reference to Israel's policy of establishing "facts on the ground," he has argued that settlements do not make Israel safer, embitter the Palestinians and make it harder to defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict. In accordance with the 2002 Arab League peace proposal and the 2003 "road map" peace plan, both of which have yet to be implemented, Obama urged Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to impose a total settlement freeze on construction in the West Bank.

Hillary Clinton, the U.S. secretary of state, put it more bluntly, declaring that the Obama administration "does not accept the legitimacy of continued Israeli settlements." In the clearest enunciation of U.S. policy, she said she wanted to see "a stop to settlements" without exception. "Not some settlements, not outposts, not 'natural growth.'"

Caving in to U.S. pressure, Netanyahu announced a partial 10-month freeze last November. But in line with his own hawkish views, and in an attempt to hold his right-of-centre coalition together, he excluded eastern Jerusalem from the plan, noting that 3,000 residential units already in various stages of planning and construction would be completed and saying that the construction of public buildings in existing settlements would not be affected by the slowdown.

The Obama administration welcomed Israel's moratorium as a step in the right direction, but Clinton said, "This offer falls far short of what our preference would be, but if it is acted upon, it would be an unprecedented restriction on settlements and would have a significant and meaningful effect on restraining their growth."

Taking his cue from Clinton, George Mitchell, the special U.S. envoy to the Middle East, said that Israel's announcement could help relaunch peace talks, which the Palestinian Authority broke off after Israel's reprisal attack on the Gaza Strip in December 2008.

Washington's abiding interest in renewing the negotiations is a function of its strong belief that if the Arab-Israeli dispute is peacefully resolved, Israel will be more secure, the Arabs will establish relations with Israel, and the Arab world will be more supportive of thwarting Iran's military nuclear program and stabilizing Iraq, prime U.S. objectives in the region. The priorities of Israel's present government, however, are at odds with Obama's plan. Netanyahu believes that once Iran is defanged, the atmosphere for peace talks will improve immeasurably, while rejectionist Palestinian groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad will be weakened.

Despite Washington's divergence of opinion with Israel, the Obama administration proceeded with its plans, with Mitchell telling his Israeli and Arab interlocutors that his goal was to create conditions for a "prompt resumption and early conclusion" of Israeli-Palestinian talks. Speaking hypothetically, but warning that U.S. patience was running out, Mitchell suggested that the United States could withhold loan guarantees to Israel if it did not co-operate.

It soon became clear that Israel and the United States, notwithstanding Clinton's comment that the Israeli government and the Palestinian Authority could not be "forced" into reaching an agreement, were on a collision course.

Last July, Netanyahu rejected a U.S. call to postpone a planned housing development in the Sheik Jarrah neighbourhood in east Jerusalem, saying that Israel's sovereignty in the city could not be challenged. The U.S. State Department countered that unilateral moves by either Israel or the Palestinians could prejudice the outcome of final status negotiations.

During this period, the United States warned Israel not to build in the area known as E-1, which lies between Jerusalem and the West Bank. Washington said that any change in E-1's status would be "extremely damaging." Clinton also criticized Israel over the eviction of two Palestinian families from their homes in Sheikh Jarrah. Shortly afterward, the White House expressed "regret" over reports that Israel planned to approve the construction of hundreds of new homes in West Bank settlements, saying that "continued settlement activity is inconsistent with Israel's commitment under the road map."

Meanwhile, White House press secretary Robert Gibbs voiced "dismay" over Israel's announcement that a further 900 housing units in Gilo, a neighbourhood in eastern Jerusalem, would be built. Toward the end of December, Gibbs deplored plans by Israel to build nearly 700 apartments in Neveh Ya'akov, Pisgat Ze-ev and Har Homa, all in eastern Jerusalem, where the Palestinians want to establish their capital.

U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu meet in Jerusalem. [Israel Sun photo]

Last month, after Obama's chief of staff, Rahm Emanuel, reportedly said that the United States was fed up with Israel and the Palestinians, Washington criticized Israel for designating two shrines in the West Bank – the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron and the Tomb of Rachel in Bethlehem – as national heritage sites. The State Department called the move "provocative."

On the eve of Biden's visit to Israel, Clinton said that "the 1967 borders, with swaps, should be the focus of the negotiations over borders." This was music to Palestinian ears, but the United States had some tough words for the Palestinians as well. Washington advised the Palestinian Authority to resume talks with Israel "without preconditions" – a Netanyahu mantra – amid Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' insistence that he would not reopen talks unless Israel agreed to a full building freeze.

Biden, an old friend of Israel, arrived in Jerusalem to strengthen bilateral relations, launch "proximity," or indirect talks, with the Palestinians and reiterate Washington's vigorous opposition to Iran's nuclear ambitions. But within hours of proclaiming the United States' deep friendship with Israel, Biden was shocked to learn that the ministry of interior, controlled by the hardline Shas party in Netanyahu's coalition, intended to approve the construction of 1,600 housing units in eastern Jerusalem. Biden condemned the politically motivated decision.

Clinton excoriated it as insulting and deeply negative. Netanyahu, while apolgizing for the "timing" of the explosive announcement, said that building in eastern Jerusalem would continue apace. But under U.S. prodding, Netanyahu agreed to discuss core issues with the Palestinians in indirect talks, ease the siege of the Gaza Strip and release some Palestinian prisoners.

Last week's discord was the worst rift in Israeli-U.S. relations in two decades, though Obama and Clinton claimed it did not reach "crisis" proportions.

Considering the gravity of the situation, the boastful comment by Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman last year that "America accepts all our decisions" sounds all the more surreal today.

In my previous column, "Israel targeted by boycott campaign," I neglected to say that the Ontario chapter of the Canadian Union of Public Employees passed a divestment resolution and called for a boycott of academic cooperation with Israel universities. I regret the omission.

For our investors, it's a happy Passover

As we celebrate our freedom from slavery in Egypt, some of us ask: why is the Romspen Fund different from all other investments? For one thing, Romspen investors have always received their monthly distribution no matter how good or bad the economic climate.

To the many Jewish investors who depend on The Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund, we are thankful for your steadfast support and confidence. From Arthur, Mark, Wes, Blake, Shelly and our entire staff, we wish you continued good health and prosperity.

Jewish Life

In defence of Jewish heritage

By DANNY DANON
JTA

Guest Voice

A new wave of Palestinian rage was unleashed recently following the inclusion of Judaism's second holiest shrine, the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron, and the tomb of our matriarch Rachel in Bethlehem on the new list of national heritage sites.

It is important to note that the list will serve as a budgetary directive to governmental agencies to ensure that these religious and historical sites receive the appropriate funding for their proper upkeep, not as any sort of political statement.

The decision led to Arab riots across the Palestinian territories and included incendiary statements from their leaders. Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas went so far as to declare the beginning of a third intifadah. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas called the move "a very dangerous provocation that could lead to a war of religions."

It's ironic how sensitive the Palestinians can be when their sovereignty over our holy sites is questioned. There was no condemnation from their leaders when Arab mobs ransacked the Tomb of Joseph minutes after Israel handed over responsibility of the site to the Palestinian Authority in October 2000. In fact, I recently visited the Tomb of Joseph – accompanied by a heavily armed military escort – and I was shocked to see the sad state of disrepair at one of Judaism's holiest sites.

It would seem that in the Holy Land, religious tolerance and freedom of expression is a one-way street. The State of Israel has worked tirelessly to ensure the preservation of religious freedom – for all faiths – since its inception.

The holy city of Jerusalem, which has been under Israeli jurisdiction since 1967, is truly open to worship by all of the world's religions for the first time in thousands of years. If only our Arab neighbours shared our concerns, then maybe there would be a chance for coexistence.

At Judaism's holiest site, the Temple Mount in Jerusalem, the Waqf – the Muslim religious authority granted autonomous control by Israel – bans non-Muslims from any religious expression. In direct contradiction to Israeli law, Jews who attempt to express any form of religious practice are forcibly removed from the area by Israeli security forces for the sake of placating the Muslim religious authorities.

Thus Mount Moriah, which according to Jewish tradition should be a place of peace for all nations, has turned into a volatile powder keg that no politician is ready to approach lest it be met with violent backlashes. It is ironic that our most precious heritage site was not included on the list, because our Arab neighbours have succeeded in convincing the world that might is right.

The Palestinian backlash against Prime Minister Benjamin's Netanyahu's list of heritage sites must be understood in the context of our recent history.

Just as the second intifadah was branded wrongfully as a defence of the Temple Mount mosques after former prime minister Ariel Sharon's peaceful visit, the current aggression has nothing to do with religion.

Time and again, Palestinian leaders have tried to spread mistruths in an attempt to erase any Jewish claim to the Land of Israel. Abbas' doctoral thesis attempted to disprove the veracity of the Holocaust. His predecessor, Yasser Arafat, claimed that the Jewish Holy Temple never stood in Jerusalem.

It is time that we put an end to this blatant and egregious revision of history. I hope that with the help of the new heritage sites legislation, future generations of Israelis will grow closer to their roots and gain a deeper understanding of our irrefutable bond to this land.

How to get fired

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Corporate restructuring in the private sector usually entails job cuts and often increased demands on "unaffected" employees. However, for those lucky enough to work for the Ontario Ministry of Revenue, restructuring comes with up to $45,000 in severance fees. And that's for people who aren't even losing their jobs.

The upcoming harmonization of the federal and provincial sales taxes into the new HST means that more than 1,000 tax collectors who are currently employed by the provincial government will soon be employed by the federal government. They will doing the same duties they were previously doing, working from the same desks with little other than the letterhead and the signature on their cheques changing. Yet, since technically they're losing their provincial jobs, they'll be eligible to collect severance pay, despite the fact they're not actually losing their jobs.

The premier (who could find no money to pay for the education of religious minorities in this province) notes that spending millions for the affected employees is the law, even though apparently the law can be amended to avoid such a payout. While amending the law mid-term is generally unfair (the only time this government did so was to retroactively rescind the tax credit for private school tuition, after parents had already paid their fees), this is surely an exceptional case.

I am reminded of the rabbinic teaching that Jerusalem was destroyed because people insisted on the strict application of the law, unwilling to act according to the intent of the law. Unfortunately, with government deficits in the billions of dollars, very little attention is paid to the mere waste of millions. Such indifference and unaccountability when it comes to public money is another moral casualty of a bloated government. Our sages were especially harsh on those who misappropriate public funds, as rectifying such is next to impossible.

Allowing "fired" workers to claim severance and at the same time keep their jobs is akin to a school firing its teachers each June and rehiring them in September, allowing the teachers to collect employment insurance during the summer. We would rightfully be aghast at such a devious ploy, and if it wasn't technically illegal, we would demand the law be amended to prevent this form of trickery.

While we expect and demand that contracts be kept, whether they're signed or in the form of an oral agreement, Jewish law recognizes that contracts can be rendered null and void by unforeseen circumstances. While, for example, a contractor can be sued for not completing an agreed-upon task, if the contractor has to attend to a sick child, no penalty can be assessed for non-performance. Furthermore an employer who fires an employee can only be sued for lost wages (i.e., severance) if the employee can't find another job. If another job is available, even under slightly different conditions, the claim is dismissed. Similarly most western jurisdictions disallow the collection of unemployment benefits if another job is readily available.

While it would be unrealistic to expect employees to refuse the money, we shouldn't lose sight of the ideal and strive if possible to employ public servants who would return money they did not properly earn. In this vein, it was refreshing, and I must admit quite surprising, to hear of plans by Canadian Olympic hockey players to donate their $20,000 bonuses, which were paid to all Canadian gold-medal winners. While these multimillionaires have little need for this pocket change, they did rightfully earn it.

Money has the ability to bring out the best and the worst in people. It's sad to see public money wasted in such a fashion. It's even sadder that apparently few care enough to do something about it.

Jewish Life

A lively book of responsa

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

Throughout the centuries, the primary function of a rabbi was not to give sermons, conduct marriages or bury the Jewish dead, but to rule on issues of Halachah (Jewish law). Ordination traditionally consisted of an established rabbi empowering a new rabbi to answer questions of Halachah, thus assuring questioners that they could comfortably consider the new rabbi's rulings to be authoritative.

Martin Lockshin

Most rabbis who followed or follow that traditional model of rabbinic work would give short answers to questions posed (generally "yes" or "no"), accompanied by a pep talk when appropriate, but almost always without footnotes. In general, the assumption was that lay questioners lacked the textual acumen to appreciate the intricacies of the halachic process.

Many great rabbis have published their "responsa," collections of questions they received (or, occasionally, pretended to receive) and answers that they gave, with learned discussion about how the halachic conclusion they arrived at was supported by the hallowed texts of the past. The target audience for responsa literature has always been other rabbis (and rabbis-in-training). Accordingly, responsa were almost always written in a difficult blend of rabbinic Hebrew and Aramaic. Reading, appreciating and evaluating traditional responsa requires either knowing talmudic texts well or, at the very least, looking up and studying the texts that are cited.

An innovative development has emerged over the last half a century: some rabbis are now writing and disseminating their detailed answers to various legal, ritual and ethical questions in a way that is accessible to an audience less learned in halachic texts. The most fascinating work of this nature is being done in Israel, where a number of "Internet rabbis" are posting their rulings on the web, with an imagined target audience of any interested reader of modern Hebrew.

Here in North America, the innovation consists in part of writing up responsa in English, thus making the answers accessible to a wide audience. This new sub-genre of vernacular responsa for non-specialists is not confined to the Orthodox. For a few decades now, Reform and Conservative rabbis have been publishing articles and books that are spinoffs from the traditional responsa model.

Toronto's own Rabbi Wayne Allen has now written such a volume: Perspectives on Jewish Law and Contemporary Issues, published in Jerusalem in 2009 by the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies. The volume consists of 85 short chapters, each dealing with an issue (practical or theoretical) that arose at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, where Rabbi Allen has been spiritual leader for the last few decades. The volume is handsome, well-written and interesting.

While one may always quibble with someone's understanding of rabbinic texts (e.g., when Rabbi Allen renders the Hebrew word zaken in a talmudic passage as "elderly," when it seems to me that the Talmud is referring to a Torah scholar of any age), the level of erudition is impressive. It is also refreshing to see how Rabbi Allen brings texts from historical, medical and scientific works to his halachic discussions. Sadly, this is rare in halachic literature.

The range of issues discussed in the book is also remarkable. Of course, it includes the kind of questions that one might find in any responsa collection, for instance, should the Yizkor prayer be recited in the first year of mourning, or may a cantor repeat words when chanting prayers. But Rabbi Allen also addresses non-standard contemporary issues, such as may a Jew own a Mercedes, are genetically modified foods kosher, may a lesbian convert to Judaism or may a Jew pierce her or his ears, nose or other body parts.

> 'Indirectly teaches about the Toronto version of Conservative Judaism'

Readers who are interested in following and/or understanding Jewish law will find the book of interest. But even those who are not committed to Halachah might find much of interest here. I learned a good deal about a number of issues with which I was unfamiliar, such as the history of clergy confidentiality or the changing attitudes to flowers at Jewish and gentile funerals over the years. (Considering the disparate nature of the topics discussed, an index, or even a few indices, would have been a welcome addition.)

While the book explicitly teaches about Halachah and Jewish history, it also indirectly teaches about another area: the Toronto version of Conservative Judaism, which is very different from most other versions of Conservative Judaism. While the vast majority of Conservative congregations in the world are now egalitarian, Rabbi Allen promotes an old-fashioned approach, arguing, for example, that a woman may not even lead the Pesukei Dezimrah section of the prayers, nor may she be the one who lifts up the Torah at the end of the Torah service, nor the one who dresses the Torah. In fact, one Internet reviewer of Rabbi Allen's book – a well-known Orthodox rabbi – has already noted that "he is sometimes stricter than I would be!" (See http://hirhurim.blogspot.com/2010/01/post-orthodox-responsa.html).

While most of those in the know will not be surprised to see just how traditional Rabbi Allen's halachic approaches are, I did find one aspect of the book surprising: Rabbi Allen's view of the interplay of law and custom in legal analysis.

Issues in Jewish law are adjudicated on the basis of a mixture of careful textual analysis and consideration of minhag, of the custom of the Jewish people. One of the conundrums that any halachic decision-maker has is determining the relative weight of text and of custom. How do I rule when the text seems to suggest one approach but the common custom of the Jewish people differs?

Generally, it is said that one of the key characteristics of the Conservative movement, when compared to Orthodox Judaism, is that minhag plays a relatively larger role for Conservative rabbis in determining Halachah. Rabbi Solomon Schechter famously argued that the actions of "Catholic Israel" (or Klal Yisrael) are a crucial factor in determining Jewish law.

And yet, Rabbi Allen shows himself frequently to be loyal to the texts and loath to cede ground to community behaviour. One telling example is the chapter entitled "Clapping, Snapping and Tapping on Shabbat." Rabbi Allen does an excellent literature review that shows, as serious students of Jewish law know, that the classical texts have a very wide definition of forbidden "musical" and quasi-musical activities on Shabbat. But as anyone who attends a wide range of synagogues knows, such behaviour is common on the Sabbath and is often seen (correctly or not) as a sign of religious fervour. Rabbi Allen himself notes that Rabbi Moses Isserles (perhaps the leading Ashkenazi early modern legal scholar), "allowed clapping, tapping and dancing on Shabbat because the practice was already so well ensconced that it would be impossible to eradicate it." And yet Rabbi Allen urges us to return to text-centred Judaism and get away from common practice. He concludes the chapter: "Since clapping, tapping and snapping are considered musical sounds, they are prohibited on Shabbat."

Rabbi Allen has produced an interesting and occasionally gripping book. Readers interested in Jewish law or in Canadian Conservative Judaism will find much of interest here.

Love, hate and criticism

By MIKE HAMEL

Guest Voice

The State of Israel is somewhat of a paradox. It is a young state with an old history.

It was established after the world came together to give the Jews a home out of the ashes of the Holocaust but was founded by an ancient love for a biblical land. The State of Israel represents the successful repatriation of the Jewish people to its ancestral home.

My parents came to Israel to re-establish that ancient bond and to build a life out of the ashes of the inferno of the Holocaust. My mother escaped the Vilna ghetto to join the Jewish partisan brigade in the forest. My father saw his little sister taken by the Gestapo at the Przemysl ghetto, and her last words rang forever in his ears, "Itzhak, does it hurt to die?"

It's Saturday night, Aug. 1, 2009. Thirty young men and women are spending the evening at the Bar-Noar, the youth program at the Aguda's lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) community centre in Tel Aviv. At 10:30 p.m., a man, dressed in black, with a black mask over his face, walks in. He's holding a black handgun. He opens fire and shoots until two teenagers lie dead on the floor and 10 more are injured. I see 15-year-old Liz. Liz, did it hurt to die?

Israelis commemorate the murders at Bar-Noar. The sign in the young woman's hand says: "Thou shalt not murder."

For more than 100 years, Jews have been returning to Israel, the only place where they can live and raise their families far away from the hatred that scarred their hearts and souls in Europe.

My parents dreamed of a country that would be better than the others. They believed that the social justice ideals envisioned by the biblical prophets could become a reality. But lately, we often hear voices within Israeli society fighting against criticism and social change, voices quick to condemn any dissent.

Israeli democracy can withstand any challenges and attacks as long as human rights organizations such as the Aguda, the country's largest LGBT group, are alive. The advancement and acceptance of the LGBT community in the last 35 years is a lighthouse of change and progress. Today, discrimination based on sexual orientation is a crime. There used to be restrictions on military service, but today the military is open to anyone, regardless of sexual orientation. Israel has an openly gay Knesset member, and gay and gay-friendly city council members are serving in various towns, promoting the needs of the LGBT community.

But the challenges are still enormous. The school climate is still homophobic, and workplace practices are not always friendly to the LGBT community. State and city social services are not always knowledgeable about specific issues and sensibilities. Formal recognition of the basic human right to establish a family, creating a legally recognized bond between two loving human beings, and their right to have children, is still far away.

Following the attack on the Aguda's Bar-Noar, Israeli society showed its strength when 75,000 people assembled in Tel Aviv's Rabin Square to commemorate this terrible crime. They came to demonstrate their support and express their disdain of hatred and violence. Such a show of support gives us the hope to keep going.

But this heartwarming support is not enough. We must use this tragedy, the deaths of this young man and woman, to effect change. We must turn this hatred into a catapult that will spring all of Israeli society to a better, stronger place: a place of acceptance, a place whereby respect is given to the wonderful human diversity of mankind, all born in God's image, all born equal.

Mike Hamel is the chairperson of the Aguda and is a leading expert on lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender social reform and human rights in Israel. He is touring Canada under the auspices of the New Israel Fund of Canada.

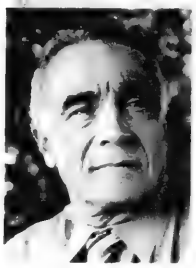
Iran seeks return to days of glory: Israeli analyst

Wants to resurrect Persian empire, Gissin tells audience

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel is threatened by Iran's theocratic and ideological regime rather than by its menacing nuclear program, an Israeli analyst told a Toronto audience last week.

The Islamic fundamentalist regime in Tehran dreams of resurrecting the glory that was the Persian empire, Raanan Gissin said.



Raanan Gissin

"Iran wants to fulfil an age-old dream of becoming a regional and world power," argued Gissin, who was senior adviser and press spokesperson for Ariel Sharon, the former Israeli prime minister. "The writing was always on the wall, but no one noticed because it was in Persian."

He added, "Iran wants a new map, a new world, not just the erasing of Israel."

The Iranian government regards Israel as a threat because it is the epitome of modernism, which the Iranian regime cannot abide, he noted.

"Israel is a major challenge to Iran and therefore must be removed," said Gissin, whose speech at the law offices of Blaney McMurtry LLP was sponsored by the Speakers Action Group, the Consulate General of Israel and the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association.

Calling the current situation "harsh and difficult," Gissin compared "the Iranian threat" to global warming. "Everyone is talking about it, but not much is being done. If you let it progress, it will become worse."

The solution is to threaten the Islamic regime rather than its nuclear arsenal, said Gissin, adding that Iran is not merely Israel's problem. As he put it, "Israel can't do it alone."

He called on the international community and Israel to co-operate and find ways to contain Iran.

Claiming that the Iranian government is internally vulnerable, he recommended covert and overt measures against it.

"There's a way to do it without sending planes. Intelligence, intelligence, intelligence. Send in the spies. Where there is a will, there is a way."

Implying that top-level Iranian leaders should be assassinated, Gissin observed, "They'll act differently if their personal safety is in danger."

Economic sanctions should be deployed, but he warned that Iran may be resistant to such pressure. "They're not susceptible to sanctions."

The Iranian regime sacrificed hundreds of thousands of soldiers in the Iran-Iraq War in the 1980s and could be ready to make more sacrifices to preserve its legitimacy and power.

Gissin said that Iran should be "re-branded" so that its imperialist intentions are revealed.

Saying that the military option should remain on the table and used only as a last resort, Gissin said Israel knows how to defend itself. He praised its intelligence services as second to none.

Turning to another topic, Gissin suggested that the present diplomatic row between Israel and the United States over the approval of 1,600 housing units in eastern Jerusalem could have been avoided if Israel had played its cards right.

"The U.S. had to respond once Israel's plans in Jerusalem became public," he said. "Sometimes, you have to avoid bringing things into the public domain."

Gissin described the dispute as a prime example of domestic politics trumping foreign policy. Calling it a "virtual issue," he explained that Israel never had any intention of building new housing units anytime soon. "But once word got out, things changed."

In his view, the Israeli government should have waited and not made its announcement during U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden's visit to Israel.

"There's always a way to handle these things," he said. Now, Gissin mused, "Israel has to deal with a crisis of public diplomacy."

The issue should be taken off the table by "quiet diplomacy," he advised. In future, Israel should "level" with the United States rather than "surprise" it before issuing announcements.

Despite current tensions, Israel's strategic relationship with the United States remains rock solid. "There is a great affinity in shared values and interests."

Gissin characterized Israel's spat with the United States as essentially a needless distraction.

"The real issue is the Iranian threat. We play into Iranian hands."

Bialik teacher incorporates music into lessons

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Nili Berman has no formal background in music, but uses it often in the Grade 4 Jewish studies class she teaches at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

"I just love to sing," she said in an interview. "If kids play musical instruments, I encourage them to bring them to class. Kids love to learn through music and through games."

Especially when teaching a second language, she said, "you have to teach in different ways, and it has to be interesting." Her subjects include Bible, Hebrew language, prayer, and the study of Israel.

A native of Ramat Gan, who grew up in Givatayim, Berman says she knew she would be a teacher when she was a seven-year-old growing up in Israel. Her mother, also a teacher, used to bring the neighbourhood kids to her so that she could teach them to read.

"You cannot run away from this," she smiled.

A graduate of Tel Aviv University (TAU), where she studied education, Bible and Jewish history, Berman moved to Boston with her husband, Oded, in the mid-1970s. He studied for his PhD at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology while she did a master's degree in education at Boston University.

She taught at the Calgary Hebrew Day School from 1978 to 1985, and for five years after that at the Cohen Hillel Academy in Marblehead, Mass., before she, her husband and their children moved to Toronto in 1991. She said she tries to "take the best" from each school to use in her classroom.

As well, she spent a sabbatical year in the mid-1980s in Israel, where she took courses in education at TAU. About 10 years ago, she embarked on a three-year program in "reflective teaching" – an approach to enhance the classroom experience – through the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, along with other educators from Toronto.

"This program really enriched me as a teacher. It gave me a chance to grow," she said. Berman has given workshops on the approach in Toronto and Vancouver.

Students' self-esteem is very important to her, she said. "If they are happy and feel good about themselves, we can achieve a lot. If they can write two sentences, then they will write three sentences, and slowly, slowly, it will grow and grow and grow."

Berman said she enjoys working at Bialik. "The quality of the program is so rich, and we work together as a team. We try to do the same things, and we give each other ideas if something is working well."

Nili Berman shows some of the scenes from Israel that she has on display in her classroom. [Frances Kraft photo]

A lesson from the teacher: "The most important thing to me is that children feel good about themselves. I don't judge them by how many words they know in Hebrew, but by their hard work. I tell them that a positive attitude and trying your hardest are the most important things."

To all our friends, family and the entire Jewish community, we extend our warmest wishes for a Happy, Healthy and Peaceful Passover!

TDSB educator runs seder at group home

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Michael Morris, 39, a vice-principal with the Toronto District School Board, is gearing up to run his 14th annual seder at a group home run by Jewish Family and Child and Youthdale Treatment Centre.

Held this year on March 25 – he is expecting about 35 people – the seder is open to staff and group home residents who celebrate Passover.

"We try to do it a couple of days before Passover, because if at all possible, we like the kids to be with their families on seder night. If they don't have a family to visit, at least they've had a seder. We work hard to try and bring families together," said Morris, who also leads the seder.

> 'It is a kosher, catered affair, and the guests have a great time'

Most of the food is donated, he said, and his father makes the chicken soup and matzah balls. "It is a kosher, catered affair, and the guests have a great time. At the end of the seder, I've always been booked in for the next year."

He said that kids in treatment centres often have a lot of problems, "but when they come to the seder, they are dressed up and well behaved. Everyone participates in the service, and there is a good sense of belonging at the table."

Morris, who often takes youths to synagogue on a Saturday morning, also does volunteer ski patrol for the Canadian Ski Patrol System. "I know how organizations, especially Jewish organizations, need volunteers, and I try to do what I can to help out. It's good for me, and it's good for them."

NDP MP censured for blocking motion

The resolution goes on to say that, "On university campuses, Israeli Apartheid Week promotes the one-sided, intolerant and unbalanced position that Israel is a racist state. This has helped create a public opinion environment where Jewish students who happen to also support Israel are subject to condemnation and opprobrium."

An alternative motion proposed by the Bloc Québécois also denounced use of the term apartheid in connection with the State of Israel.

The resolutions failed to receive all-party support and never came to a vote.

MP Libby Davies, the federal NDP House leader and a vocal critic of Israel, stated in a letter to supporters: "The Conservative motion was designed to be divisive and to censure legitimate debate on the issue of Israel's policies, as well as to specifically target activists who are engaged in debate and other activities on various campuses across the country.

"I didn't support either motion, and whatever one thinks about the term 'apartheid' in reference to Israel, I don't believe that members of Parliament should have any role or influence in stifling open discussion and education on this issue. As someone who has visited the West Bank and Gaza twice (most recently in August of 2009), I know first hand the impact and destruction caused by Israeli policies towards Palestinians."

The Canada-Israel Committee censured Davies for scuttling attempts at reaching an all-party consensus on the issue.

"Libby Davies' utter disregard for the plight of students who are bullied and intimidated on campus in Canada is staggering and unacceptable," said CIC national chair Moshe Ronen. "This is not an issue of free speech. In fact, the Israeli Apartheid Week stifles dialogue, does not constitute legitimate criticism and is simply hateful."

INTERFAITH SYMPOSIUM: Representatives of the three Abrahamic religions gathered last week in Bradford, Ont., for an evening of interfaith dialogue on the subject of reconciling faith and loyalty to one's country. Pictured, from left, are Rev. Terry Weller, a Christian minister; Mark Freiman, national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, and Mubarak Nazir of the Ahmadiyya Muslim Community of York Region, the event's sponsor. Freiman told the 200 assembled that the Torah calls for respect for minorities and Judaism has a long tradition of respecting civil authority, which stops short when it demands that Jews stop being Jewish. Nazir called suicide bombers who commit atrocities in the name of their religion a "blot" on Islam. [Ron Csillag photo]

St. Louis commemoration set for November

Monument to be unveiled, education program slated for Remembrance Day

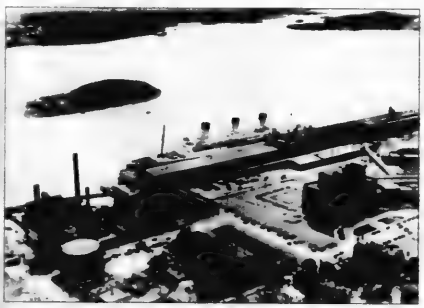
By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

On Remembrance Day, when Canadians pay tribute to the members of the armed forces who helped liberate Europe from the Nazis, a smaller group will gather at Halifax's Pier 21 to commemorate a less glorious chapter of our history.

On Nov. 11, a monument will be unveiled remembering the MS St. Louis, a German passenger ship that was turned away from Canada in 1939, ending the last, best chance for 937 passengers to avoid a fate at the hands of the Nazis. The ship returned to Europe, where more than 250 were killed.

Titled "None is Too Many: Memorializing and Commemorating the St. Louis," the program will include a monument, as well as an educational component aimed at Canadian middle school children.

Bigotry and anti-Semitism were at the heart of the attitude that closed the door to the St. Louis refugees, and that attitude didn't come out of the blue, said David Goldberg, Canadian Jewish Congress' project manager and educational consultant for the commemoration. Congress received $500,000 from Citizenship and Immigration Canada to mount the exhibit under the Community Historical Recognition Program (CHRP).



Pier 21 in Halifax

Goldberg said the exhibit that will serve as the centrepiece for the St. Louis commemoration will be unveiled in April or May, following the adjudication of a competition that attracted prominent artists, sculptors and architects. "They are people of considerable prominence in their fields," he said.

In addition, he is preparing a 16-page educational booklet to coincide with the event, which is geared to children in grades 6, 7 and 8. It will be distributed to schools across Canada, along with guides for teachers aiding them in presenting the material in class.

Goldberg said the monument at Pier 21 – Canada's Ellis Island – "acknowledges Canada as the last country denying safe haven to the 900 plus Jews on the St. Louis."

Cuba and the United States both turned the ship away before its captain attempted to disembark his passengers in Canada. However, Canada's immigration policy was being executed by Frederick Blair, a bigot and anti-Semite who had been appointed director of the immigration branch of the Department of Mines and Resources by then-prime minister William Lyon Mackenzie King.

"Blair didn't make this decision out of the blue," Goldberg said. His views were shared by the "upper echelons of government and society," and the social, economic and political conditions in Canada at the time permitted the King government to adopt these policies.

Canada at the time was marked by "an underlying anti-Semitism, nativism, [high] unemployment, fear of the unknown, conservatism and racial and ethnic [bigotry]," Goldberg said.

Jews had been singled out among other groups as undesirable for immigration since the 1890s, but restrictions weren't put in place until the 1930s, he added.

Goldberg said the educational booklet will address these issues, but it won't paint the historical record as being monolithically bleak.

The booklet concludes with "a very positive message," noting that starting in 1947, the country's immigration policy changed, with Canada becoming more welcoming to refugees. From 1933 to 1947, Canada admitted only 5,000 Jewish refugees, the lowest of any western nation, Goldberg noted.

"I think there is a causal relationship between the negative experiences the Canadian public took – the embarrassment and shame people took from the St. Louis experience – and after 1947 when the Canadian government changed policies on absorbing Holocaust refugees," he said.

The Remembrance Day program is expected to attract senior officials from all levels of government, people from various walks of life, Holocaust survivors and even former passengers from the St. Louis, he added.

'One agunah is too many'

Despite changes in law, 'the problem persists'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Not long after giving a talk at Congregation Bnai Torah last summer, lawyer Sharon Shore began receiving phone calls from a number of women grateful to her for raising the issue of agunot, Jewish women who can't obtain a religious divorce.

"Thank you for giving us a voice," Shore recalled one of them telling her.

Shore, who practises family law, said many in the Jewish community had thought the problem of agunot was resolved after two important amendments to the civil law were enacted years ago.

In 1986, Ontario's Family Law Act and in 1991 the Federal Divorce Act were amended so that husbands who refused to grant their wives a religious divorce, a get, were prevented from seeking civil remedies connected to their marriage breakup. They couldn't obtain custody, financial support, property division or a civil divorce until they had removed all religious barriers to their spouse's remarriage.

Despite those changes, Shore handles four or five cases a year in which "a husband tries to use the get to extract concessions from his wife in areas of custody, support and division of property. I'm sure there are more out there," she said.

In a recent paper on the topic When Jewish and Civil Law Collide, which focused on whether a prenuptial agreement was a viable remedy, Shore said the issue of gets still comes up during negotiations "as a leverage point to extract concessions from the wife. The effect is to leave women vulnerable to extortion, despite the civil laws in place to protect them… Giving up monetary claims is regarded by many as a better alternative than living as an agunah."

She argued that prenups, which have been effectively employed in the United States, could address the problem in Canada, though our domestic law makes their effectiveness less certain.

While Shore acknowledges there has been improvement in the situation facing women and that some Jewish organizations have taken steps to address the issue – refusing synagogue honours to a recalcitrant husband, denying a role as a director or officer in Jewish organizations – she believes "we need a community-level effort" to tackle the problem. "This, too, should be a pressing issue and a concern," she said.

Yael Machtinger has studied the issue as part of her master's thesis at York University. Her 71-page work, titled the Sounds of Silence, included interviews with four agunot as well as religious authorities. Her first interview, she said, came after she gave a public lecture at the Beth Avraham Yoseph synagogue during Shavuot.

"People were surprised I was talking about it publicly," she said, "But after I finished, people applauded… That's how I got my first interview."

A woman approached her with the story that she had been an agunah for 10 years and that her husband "out of pure malice" withheld a get.

Although she eventually did get the divorce – only after her friends flew in a rabbi to convince him to provide it – "it took her seven years to then meet someone new and get married."

Quoting the woman, Machtinger writes: "He took the best years of my life and I took the blame."

Machtinger, who describes herself as Orthodox, said, "My goal is not to alienate myself from my community. I believe Jewish law and Canadian law can coexist," but the current situation "is a problem."

The number 1 issue in Toronto, as she sees it, is that "there's a misconception that it's no longer an issue, that we solved the problem."

What is required, she continued, is that "the larger community acknowledge that it's still going on."

As to the number of agunot in Toronto, Machtinger said "quantifying it is not the issue. One agunah is too many… You just have to scratch the surface and see that the problem persists.

"It's very difficult if not impossible to get a statistic on this," she continued. "There's a lot of shame for women, and I believe the men should feel shame."

John Syrtash

There are no specific programs or support groups in Toronto for agunot, she said, adding that Montreal, New York and Israel "have organizations that help agunot."

One activist group, Organization for the Resolution of Agunot (ORA), is a not-for-profit that helps couples resolve their differences and effectuate a Jewish divorce. ORA has been known to picket the husband's home or work to shame him, Machtinger, 23, said. The organization publishes the names of husbands who are withholding gets in the Jewish press as seiruvim, people who are in contempt of an order of a beit din.

Some beit dins will even pronounce a cherem, ostracizing the individual from the community if they repeatedly ignore the religious court's invitations to appear and resolve the issue, she said.

Of the four women she interviewed for her thesis, two eventually received gets, thanks to the intervention of American rabbis, while two haven't.

For those unfortunate two, "their personal lives are essentially debilitated because they can't move on. They can't remarry or have kids."

She would like to see more social pressure and "a public conversation about this. People should be aware it is going on."

John Syrtash, a family law lawyer whose practice includes Jewish divorces, agrees that there are women who, despite changes to the civil law, still find themselves without a get.

Nevertheless, "without deriding the suffering of those women, we have to work very hard for these women, but we have to celebrate how dramatically improved the system has become," he said.

Compared to the period prior to the changes to provincial and federal law, "it's like night and day. It's dramatically better.

"You are always going to find exceptions, intractable problems," he said.

Agunot problem still exists

The Supreme Court of Canada, in its 2007 decision in Bruker vs. Marcovitz, ruled a husband was in breach of contract when he ignored an agreement on the breakup of the marriage that required him to provide a get.

"This kind of conduct is no longer sanctioned in the community and among the general public," Syrtash said.

Prior to changes in the law and its educative elements, "people said, 'Why not use it as another tactic?'" Syrtash said.

Today, "in the overwhelming number of cases, it's not a problem, because the law and the social element have improved dramatically." Those good-news situations, where an Orthodox beit din resolves disputes between spouses, don't get reported, he said.

One under-appreciated aspect of the issue is the extent to which women are now using gets as a lever for some sort of benefit or out of malice, Syrtash said.

Although only a man can offer a get, the woman must willingly and without coercion accept it. If she refuses, her husband is also in marriage limbo, bound to his wife. "I've had a number of men pay a great deal in legal fees to extricate themselves from situations where women adamantly refuse to accept a get," he said.

In one case, a couple were married for only a short time before breaking up. The woman refused to accept the get and though a rabbinic court in New York approved the get, she refused to accept it. She moved to Israel, and her husband continues to pay spousal support for fear that if he visits Israel, he could be arrested under that country's laws for refusing spousal support.

Yael Machtinger

"It's not a women's issue," Syrtash said. "It's a Jewish issue."

He said some lawyers refuse to work with the beit din's Rabbi Mordechai Ochs. A co-operative approach is beneficial to comply with the halachic requirement that a get be granted voluntarily. If a lawyer goes through the civil system and presents the beit din with a court order requiring a get, that can be interpreted as coercive and scotch attempts to grant one, he added.

Syrtash said consulting ahead of time with Rabbi Ochs can help solve problems before they arise. The rabbi, he continued, "is very creative and successful in dealing with the legislation."

(Rabbi Ochs did not respond to CJN requests for a comment.)

By taking a co-operative approach and being sensitive to religious sensibilities, lawyers can succeed in providing clients with both Jewish and civil divorces.

Based on his practice, Syrtash estimates that "98 per cent of the people do not fight a get. That's a success."

Volunteer in Eilat this summer

Compiled by CJN Staff

Volunteer opportunities in Eilat, Israel, for people age 19 to the late 20s who have had at least one year of university or college are available in the areas of child education, environmental preservation and community involvement.

Participants in the Canada Israel Experience's Eilat volunteer program can choose to work with children in schools, daycare centres or camps. If they prefer, they can help preserve Eilat's coral beach reserve, explore its marine culture while assisting with research, or volunteer at the Hai-Bar animal reserve.

Canada Israel Experience (CIE) is currently accepting applications for the program, which begins June 1, and has three sessions of four, six or eight weeks.

The Eilat volunteer program is part of a larger UJA of Greater Toronto initiative, in partnership with CIE, to provide opportunities for young Jewish leaders to become immersed in a local Israeli community and facilitate growth in and strengthen the region.

Volunteers will reside in the new Eilat Ben-Gurion campus dormitories built with major support from the Toronto Jewish community.

The program's goal is also to help strengthen Toronto Jewry. "Participants can internalize their experience by gaining a greater insight where they fit within the community and where Judaism fits in their heart," said Mira Schwartzburg, the Eilat volunteer program co-ordinator.

Volunteers are responsible for flight and food expenses in addition to a $500 program fee. The remaining expenses are covered by UJA Federation.

For an application, contact Mira Schwartzburg at mschwartzburg@ujafed.org. Application deadline is April 15.

Camp Northland-BB plans 100-year reunion

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Camp Northland-B'nai Brith will mark its 100th anniversary with a reunion and fundraiser on April 14.

Admission to the event – which will take place at 6 Degrees Club in Toronto and will feature kosher food and camp memorabilia displays – is $118 per person.

The proceeds will help send kids to the camp, located on Moose Lake in Haliburton. NBB has subsidized camp fees for families who need financial assistance for many years.

Sandy Keshen – now president and CEO of Reena, which serves people with developmental disabilities – attended the camp as a 10-year-old immigrant from Poland in 1948. "I spoke no English," she recalled. She had survived the war in Russia and arrived in Canada only two months before she started camp.

Keshen is still friends with two women she met that summer. "One was Canadian-born and taught me a great deal. She was my defender, making sure I was not ridiculed for my lack of English or appropriate attire."

Sherri Freedman – a camper at Camp B'nai Brith from 1969 until 1974 and a staff member from 1979 to 1984 – told The CJN that camp teaches many skills. Among those that she uses every day, she said, are "things like working with other people, respecting what other people bring to the table, doing public speaking… You learn how to motivate people, empathize with people, operate within a hierarchy… and you learn how to have fun, and you learn that if you make an idiot of yourself, it's not the end of the world."

Director John Bernstein with campers in the 1960s

"I only left because I got married," Freedman said.

The 49-year-old vice-president of development for the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation and a co-chair of the upcoming reunion/fundraiser, Freedman said organizers hope the evening will be fun, celebratory and infused with a camp spirit.

The camp's history dates back to 1909, when the Jewish Girls' Club was formed in downtown Toronto under the sponsorship of National Council of Jewish Women. The club, funded by the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies, offered programs like basketball, dramatics and shorthand, and also ran a summer camp called Camp Camperdown.

The Jewish Boys' Club, formed in 1921, ran a summer camp too, in co-operation with B'nai Brith.

In 1945, the Jewish Camp Council – the charitable organization that runs Camp Northland–B'nai Brith – was created by five groups running Jewish summer camps: B'nai Brith, National Council for Jewish Women, the Mothers' and Babes' Summer Rest Home Association, the United Jewish Welfare Fund of Toronto, and the YM-YWHA. The council was formed in part to administer Camp Northland (which opened in 1938 as Camp Frailoch in Torrance, Ont., and relocated to Haliburton four years later) and its sister camp for girls, Camp Bnai Brith.

Reunion co-chair Howard Hanick, 49, is a former Northland camper, counsellor-in-training and staff member. He met his wife Debra at camp when he was 20.

Hanick, an accountant who is on the board of directors of the Jewish Camp Council, recalls mostly the size and the beauty of the 750-acre camp property.

The upcoming reunion has elicited "an incredible response," Hanick said. "People are getting excited sharing photographs and sharing memories. The meetings we've been having have been like mini-reunions. It's been a lot of fun just within the committees. Hopefully we can capture that."

As of last week, about 800 people had joined the reunion's Facebook page.

The camp is "a community camp, and it really does feel like a community," said Nicole Markowitz, who became director of the camp last year. "Campers and staff are non-judgmental. It's a very comfortable environment, very welcoming, very accepting."

As well, she added, it is a Jewish camp both in terms of its population and its programming.

The camp experience can have an "amazing positive impact," Markowitz said. "One of the main things is the sense of independence and self-confidence that the camp experience fosters."

Philanthropy 'has to grab you,' authors advise donors

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

For many people, philanthropy is like "a civic religion" because both are concerned with helping the world, according to Jeffrey Solomon, co-author with Charles Bronfman of the recently released book, The Art of Giving: Where the Soul Meets a Business Plan.

Speaking at a launch of the book last week at the Toronto Reference Library, Solomon said, "We are always in search of identity, meaning and community, which historically were found in religion."

On the panel with Solomon, who is president of the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies (an umbrella of charitable foundations), were his co-author, who chairs the group and was a co-founder of Birthright Israel, as well as Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and Rahul Bhardwaj, president and CEO of the Toronto Community Foundation. The event was structured as a discussion with the two authors.

In reference to the relationship between philanthropists' souls and their business plans, Bronfman said, "You have to find out what makes you feel good... and every day, the only thing that matters is, did you derive satisfaction from what you're doing? It has to grab you. You have to say this is important. You have to translate it into a budget. If you want to make any kind of a difference, you have to decide what you can afford, and how you are going to spend it."

Young adults take different approach, says Bronfman

Bronfman divides philanthropic giving into three groups: relationship-driven donations (by friends who ask you to give); "social taxes" including UJA Federation and other umbrella organizations, hospitals and the "less fortunate;" and "your own mission in life and the niche you see as possible for you to make the world a somewhat better place when you leave it than when you came into it."

The latter reflects today's world more than it did in the past, said Solomon, who has worked with Bronfman for the past dozen years. However, he said, he prefers to remain "value-neutral... the question becomes, whether you're [donating] for altruistic or egotistic reasons, how to make it better."

Bronfman noted, as well, the different approach taken by young adults in their 20s. "Generation Y... doesn't like organizations. They like to be themselves and do what they want, and they're tremendous experimenters. They're going to make a huge difference in this world, I'm convinced of that. So organizations are going to have to change. We all have to have to change. Private foundations have to change in order to reach out to those folks. If you can run a company in your 20s, why can't you start running an agency of the federation, or the Toronto community foundation, or anything else?"

Solomon offered some advice for new philanthropists to maximize their impact: in cases where their assets are "relatively low," he said it is "far more efficient to use community foundations" than to establish a private one, which is is expensive to run.

"We're not being paid by either of you to say that," he quipped to Sokolsky and Bhardwaj.

As well, he added, there has to be a business plan. He also advised re-evaluating philanthropic portfolios and rebalancing them like personal investment portfolios.

"We would urge those in philanthropy to take some risk," said Bronfman.

"It's your money, not community money. See what can happen. Sometimes you're going to fail. We failed in some of the things we tried to do, but then you hit a home run like Birthright. There are lots of things to be done in this world."

NCJWC closes national office, local thrift store

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Facing budget constraints, the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada (NCJWC) has closed its national headquarters here, and its Winnipeg section will be shuttering a thrift that opened more than 60 years ago.

The national office, which was located on Main Street in the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre, a non-profit seniors centre established by council, was closed in early January after an organizational restructuring. The Just a Second Shop will cease operation on March 27.

"We had to close the national office… and cut a staff position for economic reasons… We just couldn't keep up the costs of running a national office," NCJWC's national president, Dianne Glass, told The CJN.

"At our national meeting in November 2009, it was decided that we would allocate different functions that the national office was carrying out to each Canadian section, and that the national office would close," she said. "So, for example, the Edmonton section office is now looking after donation cards, Toronto is looking after communications and website, Vancouver is in charge of advocacy and our membership roster… Everyone has part of the responsibilities that used to be run out of our national office."

Notwithstanding that the decision was made for economic reasons, Glass said, there may be some benefits to the new structure.

"This new system gives each section more ownership of the organization. From a personal perspective, I think it's good, because now each section in each city understands better what it takes to run a national organization… The presidents of each chapter are communicating more between each other than before," she said.

She also noted that they "are going to evaluate how this new system is working out for each section and see if we need to make any more adjustments."

The hard economic times have also affected council's Winnipeg section, which ran the Just A Second shop on a for-profit basis.

"This has been very sad for us… Since 1949, we've had a thrift store," said Sharon Allentuck, the Winnipeg council member in charge of supervising the closing. "It's been sad for members of our organization and for customers in the neighbourhood."

Allentuck said the store, located at 725 Osborne St., has been losing money in the past year.

"Our overhead was too high and rent was too high. There's a lot of competition from other thrift stores, and we just couldn't keep up… We had to make a business decision… About 20 years ago, we were profiting at least $50,000 from the store. Over the years, we made a lot of money with the store… But in the last few years, we were struggling."

Winnipeg section president Rose Aziman said that without the store as a source of revenue, her organization will continue to sustain itself "by doing other fundraising and by applying for grants for specific projects, from different agencies, depending on the project."

Allentuck said, for example, that "when we had a genetic testing educational project last year for Jewish women, we successfully applied for a grant from the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

"We own the building where the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre operates, although the living centre pays all the expenses associated with operating the building. Because of that, we have been able to keep the building and not had to consider selling it. That's good for everybody," Allentuck said.

Suspect arrested for Calgary anti-Semitic incidents

Compiled by CJN Staff

CALGARY — An 18-year-old man has been arrested in Winnipeg in connection to several graffiti incidents that occurred in Calgary in November 2009.

Canada-wide warrants had been issued for the man believed to responsible for spray-painting anti-Semitic slogans and signs on the Calgary Jewish Community Centre and nearby Holocaust Memorial and the Chabad Lubavitch Centre.

"There was some swastikas and words such as 'kill Jews' and 'six-million more,'" said Staff Sgt. Don Coleman.

An investigation led officers to believe the suspect was in Winnipeg. Winnipeg police were contacted and they made the arrest late last week.

The suspect was wanted on Canada-wide warrants for one count of mischief to property, two counts of mischief to a place of religious worship motivated by hate and one count of inciting public hatred.

Under provisions of the Youth Criminal Justice Act, the suspect cannot be identified, since the offences were committed when he was 17.

Canadian Jewish Congress praised Calgary police for investigating the case.

"The perseverance of Calgary Police Service [CPS] shows that even cowardly acts performed under cover of darkness can be traced to their source. We congratulate the CPS for their commitment on this file and for their recognition, demonstrated through the laying of appropriate charges, that criminal acts motivated by hate impact not only individuals but target entire communities," said Congress CEO Bernie Farber.

Baird takes close look at Israeli airport security

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Federal Transport Minister John Baird spent several days in Israel recently exploring that country's airport security methods and looking for ways to adapt its successful screening measures for use here in Canada.

John Baird, right, with the Western Wall Rabbi, Shmuel Rabinowitz, centre, and Nathan Jacobson.

"We had an amazing trip," said Baird, whose senior policy adviser, Adam Blinick, accompanied him. "We had a significant number of security briefings, met with representatives of Shin Bet, with people involved in aviation counter-terrorism, and learned a tremendous amount… we learned about security for cargo, people and airport security. Obviously, the threat in Israel is different, but there is much we can learn, particularly on behavioural analysis. That was worth the trip in and of itself."

Baird, who is also federal infrastructure minister, met with his counterparts, Israeli Transportation Minister Yisrael Katz and Uzi Landau, minister of national infrastructure.

They agreed to work together on a Canada-Israel Blue Skies Agreement to allow more links between the countries, providing more accessibility for Air Canada and El Al in each others' countries.

Baird said he told them, "You can't have a better friend of Israel than Canada – and especially me – so if we can't come to an agreement that helps both of us, we never will!"

Other items on Baird's agenda included briefings about Canada's involvement in the West Bank, where, he said, "we provide work, but don't provide money directly." He said the economy in the West Bank is showing some positive signs, which he feels will lead to an easing of tensions.

A visit to a company that's working on an electric car, which Baird said would be great for investment and reduce our reliance on the combustion engine, as well as a meeting with the private operator of the main north-west highway (built with Canadian assistance) and a meeting with Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat were also on Baird's itinerary.

During dinner with Canada's ambassador to Israel, Jon Allen, Baird said they celebrated the recent memorandum of understanding between the Toronto Stock Exchange and the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange. "This will be great news for both Canadian and Israeli companies," he said.

Canada will be investing in new airport security equipment and has awarded a contract to a U.S. firm with Israeli expertise.

"We are taking some significant moves on aviation security. There are a lot of lessons we can learn [from Israel]," said Baird.

Summing up, Baird said "there is a growing recognition that the Canada-Israel relationship has made a huge leap… over the last four years, which made me very proud."

Israel faces tough choices on torture, prof says

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Is torture ever permissible? If so, under what circumstances? Initial responses to the contrary, these questions themselves prove tortuous to the legal minds wrestling with them.

Prof. Yuval Shany, a law professor at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and academic director of the Minerva Center for Human Rights, has been involved in this area of research for a number of years. Currently teaching international law at Columbia University Law School, he spoke March 11 at Ottawa's Agudath Israel Congregation at the invitation of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem on "the prohibition against torture in Israel: how absolute is absolute?"

Shany said that there's "a growing acceptance in international law, and in the domestic laws of most countries, including Israel, that human rights are relative and have to be balanced against other individual rights and society interest."

The challenge of balancing, however, is extremely problematic, he said. From a human rights perspective, the adoption of absolute norms of behaviour would be preferable. However, in real terms, there are considerable costs to this approach.

Shany outlined international legal rulings dealing with the absolute prohibition against torture and the establishment of a "two-degree understanding of the norm... degree two involves cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment and degree one involves the more intense forms of suffering."

In other words, such treatment as sleep deprivation, excessive noise exposure, sensory deprivation, food manipulation and "wall standing" would be considered cruel and inhuman treatment, but not necessarily torture, he said.

The argument for an absolute ban on torture is strengthened by such considerations as the "slippery slope argument," that once an exception is made for one circumstance, it becomes easier for each successive exception to be accepted. Another compelling consideration is that torture corrupts the torturer.

Theory is, however, only abstract, but in day-to-day reality, Shany said, "Israel has really faced a very serious security threat – in particular a wave of suicide bombing, which rendered many standard law-and-order responses inadequate."

While admitting that Israel has employed "coercive interrogations" in relation to terror cases in the past, and that there have been major debates about the possible use of torture in extracting information from terrorists, Shany is of the opinion that torture has probably not been eradicated in Israel, but exists "below the surface."

He added: "Torture is evil, but in real life, sometimes you have very cruel dilemmas and there is no right thing. You have to exercise moral judgment, assume the consequences and minimize the harm you inflict.

"Sometimes you create laws knowing that there will be circumstances when the application of the law will be wrong. There are cruel dilemmas, and the law's ability to solve the dilemmas is often limited."

Quebec's health system defended

By JANICE ARNOLD

MONTREAL — The man overseeing health care on the Island of Montreal insists the situation is not as bad as it is being portrayed, with daily stories of overcrowded emergency rooms and long delays for surgery and other treatment.

"The media give the impression... that we have probably one of the worst systems in the world," said David Levine, president and executive director of the Montreal Health and Social Service Agency.

"There's a touch of exaggeration in that."

But he didn't deny the system is desperately in need of fundamental change.

Levine was the keynote speaker at a two-day conference organized by the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors (CJCS) and attended by about 150 community and public sector health and social service professionals working with anglophone seniors in different parts of the province.

Sutton Group Admiral's record growth continues unabated

Murray Goldkind
Broker of Record

Using a simple formula of maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents, Sutton Group Admiral Realty has experienced the kind of spectacular growth that has surpassed even its own high expectations. The "R" word isn't in their vocabulary.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team, which now numbers over 220 agents, has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to enter the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Broker of Record Murray Goldkind prides himself on his ability to read and respond to the needs of home buyers and sellers. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't." And implicit in this value, he notes, is the quality of service provided by the broker or agent. "If you have to do more than say, 'I'll take the red one,' we're not doing our job."

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol Goldkind, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

Quebec Press Council raps 'racist' headline

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Quebec Press Council has faulted a Laurentian weekly newspaper for "an inaccurate, sensationalist and racist" headline on a story last year about Jews living in Val-David.

In a decision released March 12, the council upheld a complaint by Harold Lehrer against Accès Laurentides about a headline that appeared on the July 3, 2009, front page. It read: "Ecole, Synagogue… Les Juifs de Val-David Condamnés – Plus de $20,000 d'Amendes! [School, Synagogue… The Jews of Val-David Condemned – More than $20,000 in Fines!]."

Lehrer, a Montreal lawyer with a country home near Val-David, pointed out that the headline didn't jibe with the story, which he found to be a reasonable account of a trial that took place in Ste. Adèle municipal court.

He deplored that the headline was not only wrong, but that it left the impression every Jewish resident had been condemned, and it would, therefore, promote racism.

Lehrer told the council that the impression was left that all the Jews of Val-David had been found guilty. In fact, it was only members of the Disciples des Rabbins de Belz pour Renforcer la Torah, a chassidic community, who were fined for violation of a municipal regulation.

He noted that the newspaper is distributed widely in supermarkets and other stores, and its front page was seen by many people, giving it an impact beyond the region it serves.

The council agreed that the headline was a generalization that made it appear the entire Jewish community had been condemned, and thereby might expose all Jews to prejudice.

The council decided it wouldn't have been hard for the editor to come up with a headline that was more precise and just as succinct.

Lehrer wanted the newspaper, which is published by Transcontinental Inc., to print a retraction and explain that it was one group not the entire Jewish population that was involved in this case.

This demand was upheld by the council as well, and Accès Laurentides editor-in-chief Eric-Olivier Dallard was reprimanded for not publishing a timely correction after Lehrer's complaint.

Dallard told the council that he decided to use the headline for two reasons. Firstly, he felt that using the long name of the Belz group was unwieldy and that the words chosen had a "very specific resonance" for local readers – the chassidic group in question.

Secondly, Dallard said "the art of titling in journalism must combine economy of words and concepts charged with meaning, all the while taking into account the facts of the news." He felt no one could have been misled by the headline.

He claimed it would "create a dangerous precedent" with repercussions for the Quebec press if he was found blameworthy.

In its decision, the council cited its code of ethics for the media, which stipulates that headlines must "respect the meaning, spirit and content" of the text. "Those responsible must avoid sensationalism and make sure that headlines and titles do not serve as vehicles for prejudice and bias."

Dallard did not appeal the decision within the 30 days provided.

Negev Gala to honour couple for philanthropy, leadership

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Larry Vickar has been active with the Jewish National Fund for most of his adult life.

He and his wife, Tova, will be honoured at this year's Negev Gala on June 1. The Vickars are being celebrated for their philanthropy and leadership in both the Jewish and the greater community.

Larry Vickar

Tova Vickar

"It runs in the family," Larry Vickar said. "My father, Norman, is a past president of the JNF and was the honoree 10 years ago," adding that 20 years ago, his late uncle, Ed, was the honoree.

"Larry has been on our board for many years," said Jacqueline Freedman, JNF development co-ordinator for Manitoba and Saskatchewan. "He and Tova have also played a prominent role in many other charitable and communal organizations, both in the Jewish and general community. We wanted to recognize them for their exemplary community service."

The Vickar family hail from Edenbridge, the early 20th-century Jewish farm colony in Saskatchewan. For more than 50 years, the Vickar name has been associated with the auto industry. Ed Vickar, who died about 10 years ago, was the founder of Vickar Community Chevrolet Oldsmobile in Winnipeg.

Larry Vickar was raised in Melfort, Sask., and moved to Winnipeg when he was in his early 20s to work in auto sales for his uncle, Ed. Larry eventually became a partner, and bought out his uncle in the mid-1990s. He built Vickar Community Chev into one of Canada's top General Motors dealerships.

Tova Vickar is originally from Israel. She came to Winnipeg, also when she was in her early 20s, and worked in the fashion industry. Now, she is also part of the Vickar Community Chev team.

The Vickars are true partners, both at work and in their community and charitable endeavours. For example, Larry chaired Winnipeg's Combined Jewish Appeal campaign in 2004 and 2005, while Tova co-chaired the Women's Campaign in 2005 and 2006.

Larry has been president of the Manitoba Motor Dealers Association and president of the Transcona Rotary Club, and he has served on the board of Ducks Unlimited.

The funds raised at this year's Negev Gala go toward the Alexander River Project in Israel. The goal of the JNF project is to clean up the Alexander River, which flows from the West Bank in the area around Nablus westward to the Mediterranean.

The Vickars' choice of this project is a reflection of their long-term interest in improving the environment. "There are a lot of stone-cutting factories along the path of the river," Larry Vickar said. "Run-off from the factories, as well as raw sewage from local communities, have badly polluted the river. The JNF is working with the Israel Water Authority and the Palestinian Authority to reclaim the river and create a green belt around it."

He said that another aspect of the project that excites him and Tova is that the river flows through the Hepher Valley, a tract of land that the JNF was able to purchase, thanks to several hundred thousand dollars that the organization raised across Canada in the late 1920s.

The Vickars viewed the Alexander River reclamation project first-hand in January when they were in Israel to attend the 2010 Manitoba-Israel Water Experts Symposium, which brought together water experts from Manitoba and Israel to exchange ideas.

"Most of the scientific meetings took place at Kfar Blum in the Hula Valley," Larry Vickar said, adding that the Hula Valley was once a swamp, which was drained by the early settlers with the help of the JNF.

"It is now recognized that that wasn't a good idea," he said. "In recent years, the JNF has recreated wetlands in the area. There is a new lake, the birds are back, and the area has become a beautiful tourist site."

Obituary

Bookstore owner helped people in Israel and at home

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Israel (Izzy) Kaplan was a passionate Israel activist and a pillar of his Orthodox synagogue who ran a book and Judaica business – Israel's Judaica – catering to the entire spectrum of the Jewish community.

Kaplan died March 15 of pancreatic cancer at Toronto General Hospital. He was 63 and had been in hospital for three months. A funeral was held in Toronto, with burial following in Israel.

Adam Fuerstenberg, a retired English professor who is editor of Parchment, Canada's only journal of contemporary Canadian Jewish creative writing, told The CJN last week that Kaplan "was a very important part of Toronto's, and even Canada's, Jewish culture."

Kaplan gave Parchment a prominent place in his store "because he felt it was something that was important to Jewish culture in Canada," said Fuerstenberg. "He was always promoting Jewish books, not just religious books."

Kaplan also initiated literary readings at the store, and supplied Jewish schools across Canada with textbooks, Fuerstenberg noted.

He said Kaplan was a vibrant man with a terrific sense of humour, "always a smile," and an interest in other people.

Avivi Gottschalk, Kaplan's assistant at Israel's, said that Kaplan was "an excellent employer. He was kind, he was understanding, and he was a real mensch."

She added that he "would get people walking in off the street requesting donations. He always had envelopes ready to give."

As well, Gottschalk, said, Kaplan "just loved Israel and he worked on its behalf morning, noon and night."

Yossi Winter, president of the Toronto Zionist Council and a friend of Kaplan's, said that Kaplan, the council's vice-president and treasurer for the past several years, was the nicest man he had ever met.

Israel (Izzy) Kaplan

At the height of the intifadah, Kaplan organized an "Israel Mall," bringing Israeli merchants here to sell their goods on at least two occasions.

"He was buying whatever he could in Israel, and saw that the merchants were suffering," Winter said. "He made sure it didn't cost a penny for the merchants [to come to Toronto.]"

Kaplan, the youngest of four siblings, was born in Toronto and attended Associated Hebrew Schools on Brunswick Avenue. His father, David Aryeh Kaplan, founded Negev Bookstore, which is now run by Izzy's brother, Arthur.

Izzy was in the family business before branching off on his own 28 years ago.

Jerry Rosenfield, a longtime friend of Kaplan's who served with him on Congregation Bnai Torah's executive and on its religious committee, and studied with him at a daily daf yomi Talmud class, said Kaplan was "such a beautiful person, soft-spoken but determined, [with] a passion for the people and for the land [of Israel]."

As well, Rosenfield said, Kaplan was non-judgmental and respectful to everyone.

Kaplan probably visited Sderot and Gush Katif (the Jewish communities in Gaza) more often then many Israelis, said Rosenfield, who is president of Mizrachi Canada.

"Nothing took him away from working on and for the people of Israel. Every time he went to Israel, he invariably extended his ticket, because he had more to do. He would arrange for friends to help people live better. They were in shacks when they were evacuated from Gush Katif [in 2005]. He arranged for them to have the necessities of life and be more comfortable," Rosenfield said. "He would raise funds privately."

Kaplan leaves his wife Susie; children David, Dayna Pappagallo and Tamara Okun, all of whom live in Israel; seven grandchildren; and, in Toronto, siblings Arthur, Morty and Fay.

Ex-Montrealer becomes a beekeeper in Israel

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

Davy Gertel remembers a time when people didn't get on a plane to Israel to make aliyah – they came by boat.

"Only prime ministers flew," says Gertel, 73, a pioneer who came to Israel from Montreal on a ship in 1949. "My family sold everything, packed a box, and came here, cold turkey."

His entire extended family in Poland had been wiped out in the Holocaust, and this is what prompted his father to bring his wife, daughter and then-13-year-old son, Davy, to Israel.

Five years after their arrival, the Gertels settled in Moshav Orot, near Ashkelon, where Gertel and his wife still live today. He attended the nearby Nahalal Agricultural High School. It was there that he discovered what would become his lifelong passion – bees.

Bees were particularly important during the early years of the state. They were critical to the country's development. "Without bees, you have no apples, pears, avocado, sunflower, watermelon, cucumbers, squash," lists Gertel. "All of these plants require cross-pollination, which means they need bees."

But this was not his only reason for going into the field. "I was fascinated by them, their behaviour," says Gertel, one of Israel's top beekeeping specialists. "When you raise cows or sheep or horses, they are mammals. They are a lot like us. But bees are a completely different world. And they are not domesticated. Their behaviour hasn't changed for millions of years.

Davy Gertel works with his bees

"I look at a nice bee the way someone else appreciates a beautiful dog or horse. I love bees."

The first beehives in Israel were brought by the Templars. Based on findings at an excavated apiary near Beit Shean dating back to the time of King Solomon, it is estimated that those ancient bees produced some half a ton of honey per year.

The first modern Israeli beekeepers were in Nes Ziona. The city's bee industry was started at the turn of the 20th century by an immigrant to Israel, Reuven Lerer, a Jew from Prussia (now in eastern Germany). Lerer traded his land for a farm formerly owned by a Templar descendant, who had abandoned his land – and his hives – and returned to Prussia, after losing his whole family to malaria.

Lerer gathered together a small group of farmers who became Israel's first beekeepers. "In the beginning it was very good. It was World War II and there was no sugar, so honey was the only sweetener available," says Gertel. Not only did Nes Tziona have a huge number of hives, it also had a huge number of orange groves, which make for the sweetest honey.

"I had the honour of knowing some of the founders," says Gertel, who has a picture from the first Israeli beekeepers' course dating back to the early 1900s. "Nuts, every single one of them."

'Israel is such a miracle'

When Gertel started his beekeeping career, he had to work with the local apis mellifera syriaca bee, a bad-tempered race that was difficult to work with. He was among the first beekeepers to import friendlier bee races from Europe and America, and begin the process of "re-queening" hives and improving the local stock. Now, he says, the apis mellifera syriaca bee is non-existent in Israel.

In the beginning, he was among some 2,000 beekeepers across the country, a pool that has shrunk to about 200, each handling many more hives, a total of some 100,000 across Israel. "I think we're one of the most crowded bee places in the world," he says, adding that the United States has some two million hives.

"Bees have so much to teach us," says Gertel. "They are all for one and one for all. They sacrifice themselves, and they work so hard. They are thrifty. They are amazing creatures. It's one of the animals we like to compare ourselves with," he says, noting that the bee appears on many crests of arms.

Gertel says that in some ways, the bees' way of life encapsulates his political outlook. "When the drones finish mating, they drop down, dead. They don't breathe a second more than needed," he says. "Maybe it's not politically correct, but I think maybe politicians could take a lesson from them – as soon as you're not productive, you're out."

At the height of his career, Gertel kept 1,000 hives and made his livelihood from honey, which he produced some 40 tons of each year. But it grew too taxing for him to collect the honey, and care for them – to protect them against hornets, disease, colony collapse disorder and more recent problems such as insecticide illnesses – and five years ago, he sold most of his hives.

He still looks after some 100 of them, which he uses to raise and sell queen bees. "It keeps me busy," says Gertel, explaining that when a hive loses its queen, they choose a random larva to become queen and feed it special food – royal jelly. When she is born, she stings all her sisters to death, mates, and starts laying eggs at a rate of 2,000 eggs per day, five times her own weight. At this point, Gertel puts her into a little box and sells her, and begins the process again, with another queen.

Now that he is semi-retired from the bee business, he has more time to spend with his four children and 12 grandchildren, all of whom live in Israel.

"We count our blessings every day," he says. "Israel is such a miracle. Since we live it every day, we tend to forget. But everything is miraculous here – the language, the nature – and to not be a part of it would be a shame. I am so happy that I have been a part of it."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

PASSOVER FOOD IDEAS

Tastes from around the world

You can heat up that matzah ball soup and whip up grandpa's famous firehouse horseradish, but make room for new Passover tastes from India, Estonia, and Israel. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), the world's largest Jewish humanitarian assistance organization, sponsors hundreds of Passover seders around the world as part of its community building and welfare programs, and these recipes were chosen to represent some of more than the seventy countries JDC works in.

With remarkable regional flare, you'll be bowled over by our spicy Moroccan fish appetizer, crave the delicious matzah stuffing with walnuts for your roast turkey, and satisfy your sweet tooth with sweet potato balls rolled in mixed nuts. As we all know, Jewish food recipes can play fast and loose withingredient amounts and cooking time, so be prepared to be adventurous for this year's festive meal. Dayenu!

Appetizer From Israel:
MOROCCAN FISH
Recipe courtesy of Rachel Tachvilian from Beit Shemesh, Israel.

4 slices tuna or Nile perch (if available)
2-3 ripe tomatoes
salt (for marinating fish and for sauce)
lemon juice
1/4 tsp. turmeric
1/2 tsp. chicken-flavoured pareve soup mix
2-3 cups boiled water, plus more boiled water if using tuna handful of fresh coriander chopped
1 red pepper, cut into wide strips
1 long chili pepper, preferably dry, cut into wide strips
1 clove fresh garlic, peeled and chopped about 1/2 cup vegetable oil
1 tbsp. sweet red paprika.

Preparation: Sprinkle salt and lemon juice over fish and let marinate for 30 minutes. In the meantime, prepare sauce by peeling the tomatoes and placing them in a wide pot. Add salt, turmeric and soup mix and bring to a boil. Mash cookedtomatoes (can use a potato masher). Then add 2-3 cups boiled water to pot. Bring sauce to a simmer.

Rinse fish: if using tuna, rinse it first with boiling water and then with tap water; if using Nile perch, rinse it with tap water. Place fish in sauce in a single layer. Place chopped coriander, pepper strips and chopped garlic on top of fish. Bring fish to a boil. In the meantime, thoroughly combine the oil and sweet paprika in a separate dish and add this mixture to fish.

After fish has boiled for 10 minutes, reduce flame to simmer. Simmer fish about another 30 minutes. Serve fish with sauce, hot or at room temperature. (serves 4)

Entrée From Estonia:
TURKEY WITH MATZAH STUFFING
Recipe courtesy of Larisa Simonova from Tallinn, Estonia.

1 large turkey

For the stuffing:
10 pieces of matzah
1 1/2 cups of white wine
vegetable oil
2 medium-sized onions, cubed
2 tbsp. of soup mix
1 stalk of celery, diced
10 rosemary twigs
3/4 to 1 cup of walnuts, chopped

For the basting oil:
1/2 cup of olive oil
1 1/2 tsp. of mustard;
1/2 tsp. of black pepper;
1/2 tsp. of paprika.

Clean turkey thoroughly. Soak matzah in a dish with the white wine, until soft. Fry the onion until the color is golden. Mix the onion together with matzah, then add the celery, rosemary, and walnuts.

Heat oven to 350. Mix olive oil, mustard, black pepper and paprika in separate dish and then smear on turkey using your hands. Stuff turkey with the matzah stuffing, placing any additional stuffing under the turkey.

Cover with foil and roast for at least 3 hours, turning it from time to time, until it gets tender and golden.

Dessert From India:
ROLLED RATALU (SWEET POTATO) WITH NUTS.

A specialty of the Bene Israel community; recipe courtesy of Rosy Solomon Moses of Mumbai, India.

1 lb of sweet potatoes
2 tbsp. of mashed dates
1/2 cup each of crushed almonds pistachios, and cashews.

Boil sweet potatoes with a little salt. When tender, peel and mash potatoes and add the mashed dates. Mix and create small balls. Roll in crushed nuts and serve.

HEALTHY NEVER TASTED SO GOOD

A Pesach tradition on a cake plate

By SYBIL KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

There is no blessing, there is no special plate. There isn't even a brachah over it! Can you guess what this well-known part of Pesach is?

It's sponge cake.

Sponge cake comes in two types: angel food and true sponge. Angel food cake has cream of tartar, an acid ingredient, which used to be combined with baking soda and salt to make a form of baking powder before baking powder was produced commercially.

Cream of tartar is what gives the angel food cake the pure white colour, and it also creates an acid reaction in the batter.

Sponge cake has a more delicate cousin referred to as sunshine cake. Most people, however, refer to the Passover version as sponge cake.

Sponge cake is usually baked without shortening or butter or baking powder, but with lots of eggs. Its lightness and texture come from careful handling and the air beaten into the eggs. Recipes with nine to 12 eggs are not uncommon.

The aim of making a sponge cake is to beat the maximum amount of air into the yolks and whites while handling them as little as possible to retain the air. Egg yolks should be room temperature when beaten. An electric or rotary beater gives better results than whipping by hand. Since there is no baking powder, the main rising factor is the air plus steam.

When you make a sponge cake, it is important that the yolks are beaten until light and thick – and the whites must be beaten until they are stiff but glossy. Essences such as vanilla, lemon or orange rind add special flavour to sponge cake.

The best pan for a sponge cake is a tube pan with removable rim. Thus the central tube gives support to the batter. The pan should also be ungreased. A preheated 350-degree oven is the best heat for baking a sponge cake.

When the cake is done, the pan should be inverted to cool for about an hour and a half. Before removing the cake from the pan, you should loosen the sides with a knife. It's best not to try to cut a fresh sponge cake with a knife. Use a divider with prongs instead, and slide back and forth gently.

Zell Schulman in Let My People Eat offers these additional tips to keep your sponge cake from falling: have the eggs at room temperature and use only large eggs; don't add sugar until the egg whites begin to hold small, soft peaks; beat the egg whites until good and stiff but not dry; and never make a sponge cake on a wet day!

When choosing a special cake for Pesach, try one of these.

ORANGE GLAZED SABRA SPONGE CAKE

1/2 cup unsalted margarine
2/3 cup sugar
1 tsp. orange rind
2 tbsp. Sabra liqueur
3 eggs separated
2 tbsp. sugar
1/2 cup potato starch
6 tbsp. orange juice
3 tbsp. Sabra Liqueur
4 tsp. orange rind

Preheat oven to 325. In a bowl, cream margarine and sugar. Add 1 tsp. orange rind. Add 2 tbsp. Sabra and egg yolks. In another bowl, beat egg whites until stiff, gradually adding 2 tbsp. sugar. Add to creamed mixture gently then stir in potato flour. Pour into greased tube pan and bake in 325-degree oven 45 minutes to one hour.

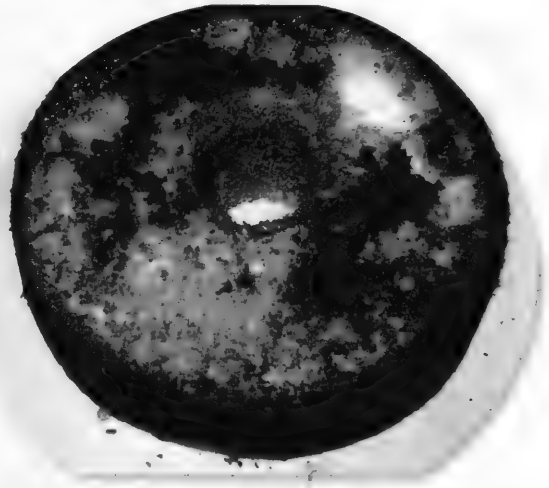
In a bowl, combine orange juice, 3 tbsp. Sabra and 4 tsp. orange rind. While cake is still hot, punch holes around cake with a toothpick and pour glaze over.

MIRIAM'S BANANA CAKE

This comes from one of my closest friends whom I left behind in Overland Park, Kansas, and who's a really creative cook.

7 separated eggs
1/4 tsp. salt
1 cup mashed bananas
3/4 cup potato starch
1 cup sugar
1 cup chopped walnuts

Preheat oven to 350. In a bowl, beat egg whites until stiff but not dry then refrigerate. In another bowl, beat egg yolks until thick and lemon coloured Gradually add sugar and salt, beating continually.



Fold in bananas and potato starch. Fold in egg whites then nuts. Turn into an ungreased tube pan and bake in 350-degree oven 45-50 minutes. Invert pan to cool.

PAN DI SPAGNA

This recipe comes from The Classic Cuisine of the Italian Jews by Edda Servi Machlin. Pan di Spagna (bread of Spain) is also called Pasta Reale and was made in the matzah bakery with the same flour that was used for matzot.

6 eggs separated
1/8 tsp. salt
1 cup sugar
1/4 cup fresh orange juice
1/2 cup Passover cake meal
1/4 cup potato starch
freshly grated rind of 1 large lemon

Preheat oven to 350. In a small bowl, beat the egg whites with salt until soft peaks form. In a larger bowl, place egg yolks, sugar and orange juice and beat until frothy and lemon coloured.

Combine the cake meal with potato starch and gradually add to the egg-yolk mixture, beating until the batter is smooth. Add the lemon rind and fold in the egg whites.

Pour into an ungreased tube sponge-cake pan with removable bottom, and bake in preheated 350-degree oven for one hour. Remove from oven and invert pan over a wire rack to cool before unmolding. 8-12 servings.

Passover Food Ideas

The Open Door Haggadah

BY BEVERLY LEVITT
Special to The CJN

On the first night of Passover, Abayudaya in Uganda; Tutsi exiles in Brussels; descendants of the Bnei Menashe in Mazoram and Manipur, India; and students in Yeshiva Kineset in Neve Yaakov, Israel, will join Jews as far away as Vera Cruz, Mexico; Warsaw, Poland; and Boston, Mass., to retell the story of a 3,000-year-old miracle.

Some are Jews by choice, others are descendants of the Ten Lost Tribes of Israel. Still others are B'nei Anusim, Jews whose ancestors were forced to convert during the Inquisition and are just now returning to their faith.

All will gather around very different dining tables to take their children's hands and lead them in their own language – with a little Hebrew interspersed – along the path their ancestors took as they escaped slavery in Pharaoh's Egypt, plunged into the Red Sea as it magically parted, and they emerged on the other side free men.

In his acceptance speech for the Nobel Peace Prize in 1964, Martin Luther King Jr. called the biblical story of the Exodus an inspiration for blacks in America fighting for their own liberation during the Civil Rights Movement. What King realized as he read from the Bible the story of how Moses stood in Pharaoh's court, pleading for the liberation of the Jewish People, is that it is a metaphor about freedom for all mankind.

As the moon rises in the night sky on March 29, families adorned in their holiday best will read aloud from The Open Door Haggadah (Central Conference of American Rabbis, 2002), with its mixture of mystical, yet practical words by Rabbi Sue Levi Elwell of Philadelphia and breathtaking, inspirational drawings by artist Ruth Weisberg.

To Yeshiva Kineset graduate, 21-year-old Moshe Boruch Levitt: "What does a little child understand better than pictures? When it goes through your eyes it stays in your heart," he says.

Rabbi Elwell's Haggadah says, "Tonight we open our doors to family and friends and embark on a journey into the past. We discover how single travellers can pursue a common destiny, how individuals can become a people..."

We gaze in wonder at the sacred seder plate filled with symbolic foods, the bottles of kosher for Passover wine, ready to be poured, and the small bowls of salt water waiting for parsley sprigs to be dipped. Burning candles inspire us; the fragrance of spring flowers makes us feel renewed. And we begin our service, anxious to teach our children and revered guests – of all cultures, colours and beliefs – why this night is different from all other nights.

As Jews, we have always defined ourselves by our food. At the seder, it will punctuate every emotion our ancestors experienced. We bite into herbs so bitter our eyes sting and we all but choke – a visceral reminder of the harshness of slavery. We dip parsley sprigs into salt water to simulate their tears. We mindlessly chew tasteless matzah, the bread of affliction, and wash it down with four cups of wine, each linked to an aspect of our liberation.

We smile with glee, anticipating our favourite Passover treat – the fruit, nut, honey and wine mixture charoset, even through it symbolizes the bricks and mortar the Jewish slaves used to build Pharaoh's pyramids. We pile maror (bitter herbs) and charoset between two pieces of matzah to make the Hillel sandwich that denounces the bitterness of slavery and celebrates the sweetness of salvation.

Holiday's food evokes memories of our ancestors

When we walk a mile in our ancestors' shoes alongside the guests at our Passover table – laughing and crying with compassion – surely this is a first step at making us realize our similarities and healing our differences.

"Until recently, family seders were an internal conversation. Today, they're more expansive," says Emily Soloff, director of the Chicago chapter of the American Jewish Committee. "Although we come to the seder with different experiences, everyone can relate to its compelling message. We should all walk through the door as if we've never been to a seder before. If we have the same expectations as last year, it's a superficial veneer. We don't want the classic Hollywood depiction – Read! Sing! Let's eat! Religion is an important part of our lives. We should approach each other's celebrations with an open heart."

MANGO-DATE CHAROSET

From Adventures in Jewish Cooking by Jeffrey Nathan.

1/2 cup walnut pieces, chopped coarsely
1/3 cup pecan halves, chopped coarsely
3 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. fresh young ginger, peeled, shredded and minced (use the large holes on a box grater)
2 ripe mangoes, peeled, seeded, and cut into 1/4-inch dice
2/3 cup seedless red grapes, quartered
1/2 cup pitted dates, cut in 1/4-inch dice
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 cup sweet white wine
2 tsp. fresh lemon juice

Toast nuts in dry sauté pan over low heat, about 4 to 5 minutes. Watch it carefully so it doesn't burn. Combine with sugar and ginger. Stir in mangoes, grapes and dates. Dissolve cinnamon in wine; stir in lemon juice; gently stir into fruit mixture with a rubber spatula. Store in airtight plastic container for at least 2 hours or overnight. Bring to room temperature before serving. Makes 3-1/2 cups.

CHICKEN ROULADEN WITH MATZAH FARFEL STUFFING

3 to 3-1/2 lb. chicken, boned and pounded flat, into an even, rectangular shape
2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil, plus more if needed
1/2 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
1 1/2 tsp. chopped fresh rosemary, divided
1 tsp. chopped fresh thyme, divided
1 1/2 cups chicken stock, preferably homemade
2 tsp. potato starch dissolved in 2 tbsp. cold water

Wild Mushroom-Farfel Stuffing

3 cups matzah farfel
3/4 cup chicken stock
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 medium onion, chopped
2 garlic cloves, minced
2 tbsp. sun-dried tomatoes, plumped and diced
8 oz. assorted wild mushrooms, such as cremini or shiitake, stemmed and coarsely chopped
1/2 cup coarsely chopped arugula
1 large egg, beaten
2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil
1/2 tsp. kosher salt
1/4 tsp. freshly ground black pepper

To make the stuffing: heat a large empty skillet over a medium fire. Add the farfel and heat, stirring occasionally, until lightly toasted, about 3 minutes. Transfer to a large bowl. Add the stock and let stand to soften while preparing the other ingredients.

In the same skillet heat oil over a medium heat. Add onions; cook until translucent, about 3 to 5 minutes. Stir in sun-dried tomatoes and garlic; cook for 1 minute. Add mushrooms and cook, stirring occasionally, until they give off their liquid, about 4 minutes. Remove from heat. Stir in the farfel, arugula, egg and basil. Season with salt and pepper. Transfer to refrigerator to cool while preparing chicken.

Preheat oven to 350. Position a rack in the centre of the oven. Lightly oil a roasting pan.

To make the chicken, lay it flat, skin side down, on the cutting board. Cover with plastic wrap. If the chicken is uneven, pound it down further so it is all the same thickness. It should be about 14 in. long and 8 in. wide. The chicken's legs should be facing you; the breast away from you so each slice will have both dark and light meat. Remove plastic wrap. Place stuffing 1 inch from the edge closest to you and spread the rest of the stuffing on the chicken. Roll it up as if you were rolling a sushi roll. When finished, tie it with butcher's twine to keep it in shape.

Brush chicken with the oil. Mix 1 teaspoon rosemary, 1/2 teaspoon thyme, and the pepper in a small bowl; sprinkle over chicken. Place chicken in the roasting pan, seam side down. Roast about 1-1/4 hours until golden brown outside and an instant-read thermometer inserted into the centre registers 140.

Remove from oven. Let sit 10 to 12 minutes until slightly cool. Place on a carving board, remove string and slice. Place decoratively on a platter.

To make sauce. Place roasting pan over medium-high heat. Pour in the stock and bring to a boil, scraping up the browned bits in the pan with a wooden spoon. Cook until thickened and reduced to 1-1/2 cups, about 10 minutes. Stir in the remaining rosemary and thyme. Whisk in enough of the dissolved potato starch into the boiling liquid to thicken according to your preference. Season with salt and pepper. Pour into a sauceboat. Serve with the stuffing and sauce. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

CJPAC fellows in the House of Commons

CJPAC fellows receive 'hands-on' political training

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Nearly 40 university students from 13 campuses across the country have been participating in an extracurricular activity that includes a trip to Ottawa.

The trip, however, involves far more than sightseeing in the nation's capital.

The students, all of whom have a keen interest in politics and a strong desire to participate in Israel advocacy, are the 2009-2010 Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) Fellows. Chosen on the basis of an application and an interview process, successful students get the opportunity to meet with MPs and senior political strategists, as well as attend a national political conference in Ottawa and engage in a full day of advanced campaign training.

Throughout the academic year, the students work with local campaign and constituency offices and are trained to plan and implement a political program on their own campuses. They also take part in bi-weekly conference calls that provide exposure to a wide variety of political speakers, and are able to network with other Israel activists from campuses across the country.

"The goal [of the program] is to get Jewish and pro-Israel students engaged in Canadian politics at an advanced level. Most of the students are already politically involved prior to participating in the program, but the fellowship program encourages them to volunteer on political campaigns, take on leadership roles in youth wings of political parties, and ultimately work on Parliament Hill or in a provincial legislature," said CJPAC executive director Mark Waldman.

"By the end of the year, we ensure that all of our fellows have received enough political and campaign training that they can feel comfortable working on a campaign. Many of our past fellows have gone on to work in senior positions in government," Waldman said.

Goal is to get students engaged in Canadian politics

Josh Zelikovitz, a fourth-year student at Queen's University in political studies and history, found the practical, "hands-on stuff" to be the most valuable skills he learned at the CJPAC Fellowship Conference, held Jan. 28 to 31 in Ottawa.

According to his YouTube testimonial, he found the training in fundraising and canvassing to be very useful, and, as a Liberal, he most enjoyed the group's meeting with federal leader Michael Ignatieff.

The CJPAC Fellowship Program runs each year from September to the end of April. Applications for the 2010-2011 academic year will be available on CJPAC's website by Aug. 1.

For more information or to apply for next year, go to www.cjpac.ca.

Young professionals shmooze with politicians

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

Hundreds of young professionals recently mingled with politicians from all levels of government at the fourth annual ACTION party organized by the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC).

This year's event, held at the National Ballet School in Toronto on March 11, was created to encourage young Jewish Canadians and pro-Israel supporters to become politically active and make an impact on issues of concern in the community, said Leah Carr, one of four co-chairs of the event, along with Emily Burnett, Noah Godfrey and Jay Klein.

CJPAC is a national, grassroots, independent organization whose mandate is to engage the community in the political process, said Mark Waldman, executive director of CJPAC. "It is the only organization that can engage in multi-partisan politics. We help the community look coast to coast to build critical relationships with friends from all parties and all levels of government. Relationships matter if we want to have an impact beyond our numbers. There are 308 ridings in Canada, not just the few we live in."

Waldman said many young professionals are naturally passionate, but don't know much about the political process. "We try to demonstrate with the ACTION party that getting involved in politics is a great way to make a difference on the issues they care about. There are also many young professionals who are political leaders. Getting these groups together helps promote political involvement."

He said CJPAC's ACTION party provides an opportunity for young professionals and politicians to unite in a relaxed and casual atmosphere. "The informal setting that the party presents allows CJPAC to demonstrate to young Jewish professionals that meeting politicians and ultimately getting more engaged in the Canadian political process should not be intimidating and can actually be a lot of fun."

Since 2007, Waldman said the ACTION party has become CJPAC's largest event. Tickets to this year's affair, which featured live entertainment, an open bar and delicious hors d'oeuvres, were sold out more than two days in advance. Politicians and political candidates in attendance included Ontario PC party leader Tim Hudak, Toronto city councillor Adam Giambrone, Toronto mayoralty candidate Rocco Rossi and Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty.

"The ACTION party has been a huge success since the first year we started it. The fact that it grows each year says that both the young professionals and politicians think it is a great event since they keep coming back. Positive word of mouth helps it grow," Waldman said.

A similar party is scheduled for Montreal on May 6. To ensure that young professionals of the Ottawa community can be part of the "action," CJPAC will arrange transportation between Ottawa and Montreal.

Aside from its annual ACTION party, Waldman said CJPAC promotes various initiatives across Canadian university campuses "that seek to build an intellectual and experiential understanding of civic engagement for students." The organization runs programs, seminars and volunteer opportunities "to increase students' understanding, skills and enthusiasm in the decision-making process to ensure a strong voice that will carry forward."

He said CJPAC encourages students to become active in the offices of candidates between and during elections and to attend national and regional conferences across the country. CJPAC's Fellowship program allows students to enhance their understanding of election campaigns and Israel advocacy in Canada, as well as opportunities to meet with elected officials and senior political strategists throughout the year.

The Fellowship program even includes a trip to Ottawa, where students can attend a national political conference, including a day of advanced campaign training, Waldman said. Currently, 37 Fellows from 13 university campuses across Canada are enrolled in the program.

For more information about CJPAC, visit www.cjpac.ca.

Dealing with custodial-parent rudeness and interference

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 28 years

Question: I have a court order that allows me to call my eight year old son at 7 p.m. every other evening. Every time I call, his mother picks up the phone and says something like: "Oh, it's the stupid bastard." She then either hangs up or, if she lets me talk to Joey for a minute of two, always listens in on our talk, and hangs up before we can finish. I always pay our support on time. I'm not a "deadbeat dad." What do I do?

Answer: Plug your phone into a tape recorder. Go to any store that sells the kind of device that allows you to bug your own phone, like Radio Shack. So long as you are taping your own phone conversations it's perfectly legal and you don't have to tell the person who you are calling. Then after a few choice recordings of her rudeness are taped, have your lawyer send a copy of the tape and a transcript. Her lawyer should remind her that unless she follows the court's order, she could be found in contempt of court and will have to pay the court costs for interfering in your rights of access. Before each call identify the time and date of each conversation. It's amazing how quickly your conversations with your son will magically improve.

Question: My ex-wife does not tolerate my daughters' friend and frustrates all access to my 12 and 18 year old daughters. What do I do?

Answer: Sue. The Court will likely give you scheduled nights of access and a good chunk of your legal costs if she forces the matter to a Court hearing. If she then frustrates the Order, the judge can fine or even jail her.

On behalf of my family, and all of us at Garfin Zeidenberg, I wish you and your family a happy and healthy Passover.

Attacking York could harm Toronto Jewry

By RUTH LOCKSHIN

It's sad that a fine institution such as York University is suffering from attacks by certain communal organizations and even by certain Jewish writers. York will make it through this crisis. But what's suffered more than York is our own Jewish community.

For a few happy generations, Toronto was a wonderful place to be a young Jewish adult. University education was (and still is) cheap. Most kids lived at home, met other Jewish kids at university, married and settled down in Toronto.

Both the University of Toronto and, later, York, provided places where kids across the Jewish spectrum could meet, whether they had gone to public school, Bialik Hebrew Day School, Associated Hebrew Schools or Eitz Chaim Day Schools. (Full disclosure: I am married to a York faculty member, and I am the mother of graduates of both York and U of T.)

The Jewish community as a whole reaped large benefits from having university-aged kids who, unlike their U.S. counterparts, remained in the community. These kids staffed youth groups and summer camps, serving as role models and teachers for the next generation, while they themselves were becoming the new young leaders of the community. They did this with very little financial help from the organized Jewish community (which was busy raising money for hospitals, schools, and always Israel). Hillel never had much of a budget in those years, and they made do without fancy viral marketing campaigns.

These kids developed Jewish networks and succeeded professionally. With a relatively low intermarriage rate, they raised traditional families and stayed committed to Jewish and Zionist causes in larger numbers than their U.S. counterparts. Jewish giving in Toronto, and support of Israel, was long the envy of other North American cities. The delicate mingling of the secular and traditional groups that took place on Toronto college campuses helped to form the rich stew that is our community.

But in recent years, this system has been weakening. Affluent families, many not Jewishly affiliated in any significant manner, have led the way, snubbing York and imitating the U.S. trend by sending their kids far away from home for school. Those kids generally don't go to popular Jewish destinations such as the Ivy League schools – their parents aren't that rich and haven't yet adopted the U.S. lifestyle of getting and spending huge sums on fancy schools.

Rather, Canadian Jewish kids have ended up in places that most of their parents had never heard of at their age – schools in small Canadian communities where Jewish life is less to be found and intermarriage becomes a much greater threat. Away from their home atmosphere and, most likely, from any Jewish youth group involvement, Judaism plays a diminished role in their lives. Meanwhile, the demand on the community to fund Jewish campus services in those far-flung places grows.

In addition, some more observant families have also felt the trend. With York incessantly and inaccurately portrayed as an unsafe place to send their kids, the more right-wing parents (admittedly responding to other trends, too) sometimes just don't send them to university at all. Even students who get their degree here in Toronto have one foot out the door, ready to bolt for New York or some other destination at the first opportunity, taking our investments in Jewish schools with them.

It's not too late to preserve our grand system. With all the problems, there's still vital Jewish student life at York and U of T. Exaggerating the problems, portraying Jewish kids as victims, and scaring them away from local campuses will harm Toronto's Jewish life a lot more than anything any of our kids will ever experience on our local campuses.

Ruth Lockshin lives in Toronto but was born in the United States.

Students learn about different faiths

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

"You're the only Jew I've ever met" is a phrase Alicia Krumholz has heard often at the University of Western Ontario (UWO).

This is one of the reasons that she participated in the university's third annual Abrahamic road trip last week. The road trip, which is hosted by the Centre for Catholic-Jewish Learning at King's University College at UWO, takes students to a Jewish, Muslim and Catholic centre, where they hear from representatives of each community.

The trip, which was free to all students and had more than 35 participants, was created to help dispel religious stereotypes and educate students about different cultures and faiths.

For Krumholz, a fourth-year religious studies and geography student, the event is a chance to both ask and answer questions.

"There are a lot of things out there to believe [about Judaism]. If you take everything at face value... that's dangerous," she said.

"This is my second year going... I feel like this is a great thing. What I've learned in religion is that there are really more similarities [than differences] between the three Abrahamic religions," she said, adding that the trip helped explain some Jewish values and misconceptions.

"History teaches us that Jews have suffered a lot of persecution. It's important to get an accurate portrayal of what a Jew is like."

This is one of the Centre for Catholic-Jewish Learning's goals, said Andrea Rector, the centre's secretary.

"I think everyone's recognizing that we're living in an increasingly globalized society and it's becoming more and more difficult to live in our isolated societies," she said, adding that the centre will be changing its name to the Centre for Catholic, Jewish and Muslim Learning in September.

"It's very important to us that people don't use religion... as a reason for conflict, and particularly for discriminating against one another. The goal is to increase people's knowledge, compassion and understanding," she said.

This year, the theme of the trip was women and faith, meaning that participants spoke to female leaders in the three religions, said Bianca Canave, one of the event's founders and a fourth-year religious studies student.

"We knew that... it would be best if we had women in the faith speak... because there are a lot of misconceptions about women in most orthodox religions, [such as] that they don't have as much of a role," she said.

Canave, who is Roman Catholic, sees the road trip as a unique learning experience.

"Students have lectures five times a week. The good thing about this is that it's fun and we only spend about 40 minutes at each place. Students leave wanting to hear more," she said.

For Canave, interfaith events like the road trip are crucial for university students.

"I think it's important for everyone to learn about the people that you interact with every day. There are a lot of students who went to [Jewish day schools] and only had Jewish friends. It's really nice to see how much they learn about [other religions]," she said.

Hanaa Alaubaid, another trip founder and participant, agrees.

"I feel like there's a lot of misconceptions about Islam and Judaism where people are mixing the cultures with religion," Alaubaid, who is Muslim and a fourth year religious studies and English student, said, adding that a road trip is a good forum for interfaith interaction.

"You get on a school bus with random people... and you're taught [about] religion. It's a completely different experience," she said.

From left, Bianca Canave, Hanaa Alaubaid and Alicia Krumholz participated in the third annual Abrahamic road trip in London, which teaches participants about Judaism, Christianity and Islam.

Participants of the Abrahamic road trip listen to Sister Farah Al-Dhaher, a professor of sociology at Fanshawe College in London, Ont. The road trip was designed to teach students about Judaism, Christianity and Islam.

Differences between male and female brain explored

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

Advances in genetics as well as differences between the male and female brain were hot topics at a recent lecture organized by Weizmann Women and Science, a branch of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science.

The March 9 event was moderated by former Breakfast Television co-host and broadcast journalist Liza Fromer. It featured guest speakers Dr. Tali Kimchi of the department of neurobiology at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel, and Dr. Kathy Siminovitch of the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Kimchi said that different genes lead to brain differences and therefore behavioural differences in males and females. However, while men and women often appear to be polar opposites, their brains are surprisingly similar, she said.

For more than half a century, scientists have believed that prototypically aggressive males and calm, nurturing females are mainly set apart by sex hormones that control genes and sexually dimorphic neuronal circuits that develop during youth. But, Kimchi said, current studies have suggested that gender-specific behaviours might have more to do with a single genetic "switch" that can be turned on and off.

Kimchi said her experiments performed at Harvard University involving mutant mice have helped her understand human genetic diseases that relate to social behaviour. She said her findings have shown that the behaviour of female mice can be radically altered when the creatures are deprived of their ability to sense pheromones, the subtle scents that animals give off and receive to communicate.

Removing the gene responsible for picking up pheromone signals from the female mice caused them to neglect their pups in the pursuit of potential mates, whom they tried to mount while emitting courtship whistles, she said. The male mice that could not smell the pheromones became less forceful and spent more time taking care of the newborn pups.

Kimchi said these results imply that the brain is capable of both male and female behaviour and that neurochemical cues initiate different actions. In the long run, her findings might improve the understanding of some disorders believed to be related to gender (males are more prone to autism, Parkinson's disease and schizophrenia, while females are more prone to anxiety, depression and panic disorders). This will in turn aid in the development of gender-specific drug treatments, she said.

A senior investigator at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, Siminovitch is striving to provide new knowledge and technologies to enable more effective and "individualized" therapies for major diseases.

Siminovitch's research is directed at identifying the molecular factors that regulate normal immune responses and that, when disrupted, result in immune deficiency or autoimmune diseases such as rheumatoid arthritis and inflammatory bowel disease. Such information is essential for improved therapeutic treatments yet to be created, she said.

Siminovitch's presentation focused on the shift in science from genes to genomics. She said the shift in science through genome education will help identify biological determinants of diseases and improve health-care delivery. Genomics examines genetic information to determine biological markers predisposing an individual to disease, while genetics simply uses the information from one or two genes to explain a disease state.

Siminovitch spoke about targeted gene therapy – "the right dose of the right drug with the right indication for the right patient at the right time." She said gene therapy is a technique for correcting defective genes responsible for disease development, and while the technology is still very new, it has been used with some success. Scientific breakthroughs continue to move gene therapy toward mainstream medicine, she said.

Activist challenges kids to make a difference

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Amanda Belzowski knows that nothing is impossible.

To date, the 12-year-old has raised about $135,000 for the Heart and Stroke Foundation, spoken to a room full of CEOs at the Toronto Stock Exchange about her fundraising efforts, and in 2007, she shared the stage with billionaire U.S. developer Donald Trump at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

And she's not done yet.

Amanda, who has been running an annual lemonade stand to raise money for the Heart and Stroke Foundation since she was about two years old, has issued a challenge to kids nationwide.

"I really just wanted to teach kids that no action is ever too small and you're never too small to make adifference in the world," she said.

"I wanted to make kids realize that turning the water off or helping an elderly neighbour really does make a difference. I wanted to teach them that they can have their own lemonade stand."

That's why Amanda and her four-year-old brother, Joshua, launched the Nothing's Impossible Challenge 2010.

The initiative, which will soon be detailed on her website, www.lemonade4heart.org, has six categories – conserving, volunteering, helping, fundraising, learning and sharing, and random acts of kindness.

Kids are encouraged to do something in five of the categories, such as bringing their family to a soup kitchen to volunteer or turning off the lights in their house to conserve energy.

Participants can log on and keep track of their progress on the website, a feature that should be up soon, Amanda said, and they'll get a certificate upon completion of the challenge.

Amanda and Joshua will also match every dollar raised, regardless of the cause, by collecting an equivalent amount for her charity.

"All the money they raise goes to their causes, and we'll meet that money and give it to the Heart and Stroke Foundation," she said. "I think it's important to realize that there are so many different causes. It's not only Heart and Stroke, it's cancer, animal shelters, cleaning up our world... I want to challenge [kids] to make a difference, I want them to see their progress, and I want them to do a lot of different things."

Amanda's lemonade stand started with a simple request. As a toddler, she saw a stand and asked to run one herself.

Lisa Belzowski, her mother, couldn't refuse.

"She didn't know what money was at that point, we thought it'd be a good idea to teach her. To teach her she could help other people. She raised $500 in her first year," her mother said.

Now Amanda's goal is to reach $200,000 for Heart and Stroke.

"When I was little, we started [raising money for Heart and Stroke] because my grandmother and great-grandfather had artificial [heart] valves, but really it's gotten bigger than that," Amanda said. "There are so many other important causes that we all need to help."

While all the money raised at her lemonade stand goes to heart and stroke research, the 12-year-old also speaks on behalf of other causes, such as preventing malaria in developing countries.

Now, with Amanda's 12th annual lemonade stand and Joshua's second cookie counter coming up in May, the activist has another challenge to meet.

She needs to find a front lawn.

This year, due to personal problems, Amanda can no longer use her grandparents' front lawn, where the event usually took place.

"The thing is that people have said, 'Why don't you do it at a community centre?' And she's really specific about saying, 'I want to leave it on a front lawn,'" her mother said.

Amanda Belzowski and her brother, Joshua, are seen here collecting donations for the Heart and Stroke Foundation lemonade stand in 2007. [CJN file photo]

"Because that's the message: anyone can do this. You can do it on a front lawn without having to rent out a place... I think it would be easier to find a school or park or something, but she really doesn't want to change that message."

Amanda's lemonade stand will be held May 16. The ideal lawn would be visible and fairly large, around 100 feet by 60 feet. For more information or to volunteer the use of your lawn, e-mail amandaslemonade@sympatico.ca.

Immigrant plans to sponsor family, then save the world

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

When Oleg Shteyner moved to Canada from Sderot, he left behind rocket attacks, bomb sirens and his mother. Now, as a first-year university student, Shteyner's mission is simple.

"I came here with a clear goal. I didn't come here to discover Canadian life or assimilate into the culture. I came here... to save my family," he said.

Shteyner, whose parents divorced when he was young, immigrated to Sderot, Israel, from Ukraine with his mother in 1999.

"At the time, the town was very peaceful. It looked like a prosperous place... Only a year and a half afterwards a war broke out. Rockets from Gaza shot into Sderot daily," Shteyner, 20, said. "It not only crippled the economic situation of the city, but it really stopped people from looking forward to a better future."

Shteyner spent his childhood and teen years living with the knowledge that every class, every meal and every day might be his last.

"When I just moved there, I was still nine years old, still an innocent kid, and you move into a place where suddenly you're being attacked and targeted for reasons you don't understand and there's so much hate," he said, adding that, because he lived in the top floor of an apartment building, any government-enforced safety precautions became difficult to follow.

"The government built up bunkers. The problem was I lived with my mother on the highest floor of a building. Our bunker was downstairs, there was no way to get there. So you kind of understand if the bomb falls on your building, that's it."

Some nights, Shteyner would sit through up to 30 rocket attacks, one after the other. This, paired with Shteyner's financial difficulties, made one thing clear for the student.

"I realized I want to get out of Sderot and move on with my life," he said. "I (didn't) want to end up dead at the age of 16, because I happen to be at the wrong place at the wrong time."

It was in 2006 that Shteyner got his chance to leave. At that time, his father, who had moved from Ukraine to Canada, came to visit and offered to sponsor Shteyner so that he could immigrate to Canada.

"He said, 'You're playing with your life... I'm able to sponsor you,'" Shteyner said.

Shteyner left Sderot in 2007, when he was 17.

"When I left I promised my mother, aunt and grandpa that once I get to Canada, I'll get my education as soon as I can. My goal is to be able to find a job and sponsor (my family.)"

It's this goal that has shaped Shteyner's life and studies in Canada.

"When you sit in the library for five or six hours and try to memorize whatever for a test, (you ask), 'Why am I doing this? I don't even like this.' You can always say, 'Listen, if you don't pass this test, you're not going to help your family,'" he said.

After graduating from Newtonbrook Secondary School, Shteyner was accepted to the University of Toronto's mineral engineering program, where he's currently a first-year student.

Oleg Shteyner, now a first year University of Toronto student, immigrated from Sderot several years ago, where he suffered through up to 30 rocket attacks a night.

Unlike most youths, Shteyner doesn't own a television and he doesn't spend much time on the computer. His life is mostly made up of school and volunteer work.

"My family is very important to me. I'll do everything to help them. If that means I have to study hard and not do whatever an average teenager wants to do, that's OK," he said.

While at Newtonbrook, Shteyner got involved with the school's Jewish Student Union Club and with NCSY (formerly National Conference of Synagogue Youth) Canada, a group that engages youth through social and recreational activities. Through this group, Shteyner, who had remained secular in Ukraine and Israel, began to learn about and immerse himself in Judaism.

"Ukraine historically is an extremely anti-Semitic country... I remember also when I was still a kid, every single year on Hitler's birthday, there were parades and skinheads all over the place," he said.

"Judaism was something very foreign to me. In Ukraine, if you know you're Jewish, that's amazing, but just don't tell it to anyone if you want to be safe."

When Shteyner moved to Sderot, he was too preoccupied with his living situation to learn more about his religion. It was only in Canada that he started to connect to the Jewish community.

"Once I came to Canada, I see people welcoming me. There's no pressure, you can express yourself and learn... I started to become more observant," he said, adding that he joined NCSY's Torah High program, an after-school Jewish studies group.

Shteyner also worked with Jewish Immigrant Aid Services as a youth-to-youth leader, is involved with his university's Hillel, works at Kachol Lavan, a Hebrew Sunday school, and volunteers as a big brother with Chai Lifeline Canada, which supports families with sick children.

Shteyner's work and life story helped him win the 2009 Dennis Waldman Scholarship, which is awarded to youth involved in the Jewish community.

The student's interpretation of tikkun olam goes further than volunteerism. He chose to major in mineral engineering at U of T, one of the school's smallest engineering programs, because he wants to physically repair the world.

"The reason why I chose this program is because I really care about the environment," he said, adding that his long-term goal is to reduce carbon emissions through mineral engineering, which includes the study of mining and geology.

Rabbi Avi Levinson, NCSY Canada's director of student advancement, thinks that, for Shteyner, repairing the Earth is a realistic goal.

"Politicians would probably die for his personality," Rabbi Levinson said. "There's no such thing as an obstacle, it's one thing after another. When he sees a cause and he believes in it, there's no stopping (him.) it's like a train coming at you head on."

Netanyahu aims to repair U.S. ties

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu arrived in Washington Monday for a visit that marks a fresh chance to repair the frayed personal ties between him and U.S. President Barack Obama.

In front of the cameras Sunday, special Mideast envoy George Mitchell invited Netanyahu to meet with Obama at the White House Tuesday evening. It will be the fourth time the two leaders have met since they took office.

The three previous meetings took place in a tense atmosphere against the backdrop of the Obama administration's dissatisfaction with Netanyahu's actions and his positions on the Palestinian issue.

As they did the last time, they were to meet in the evening. As a result, there would be relatively little immediate media exposure in Israel. It was also not certain that the White House would allow photographers in, or whether the two leaders would make public statements.

The meeting between the two men came after Netanyahu's positive response to most of the demands made by the U.S. administration following the controversy over the announcement of plans to expand the Jewish neighbourhood of Ramat Shlomo in east Jerusalem.

Netanyahu agreed to ease the economic siege on the Gaza Strip, release Palestinian prisoners affiliated with Fatah and discuss the conflict's core issues in the context of indirect talks with the Palestinians.

Netanyahu did not agree to the American demand to limit Israeli construction in east Jerusalem, but did commit to closer monitoring of building in the city to avoid embarrassing incidents such as the announcement regarding the apartments in Ramat Shlomo during the visit of U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden.

Netanyahu was to meet with Biden and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and address the current American Israel Public Affairs Committee conference.

Special Mideast envoy George Mitchell and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in Jerusalem last weekend.

At the beginning of Sunday's cabinet meeting, Netanyahu said his government would continue to pursue a policy held by all governments since the Six Day War, stressing Israel's right to build in east Jerusalem.

"From our standpoint, building in Jerusalem is like building in Tel Aviv," he said.

He later added that "these are things that we made clear to the American administration. We also made it clear that in the proximity talks with the Palestinians, each side could present its positions on all matters in dispute, but a real solution to the fundamental problems between us and the Palestinians is achievable only through direct talks, in direct peace negotiations.

"It is only if [the parties] sit together and together clarify the issues that they can come to joint solutions. This is the only way to come to a genuine peace agreement."

Netanyahu also met Sunday with UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon and Tony Blair, the envoy of the Quartet of Mideast mediators – the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia.

Efforts to get indirect talks started with the Palestinian Authority topped Netanyahu's agenda with the visitors. Mitchell told the Israeli prime minister that the Obama administration hopes to embark on indirect talks at full speed as soon as possible, to be followed by direct talks.

Sources in Jerusalem expect the proximity talks to begin after Passover. After a meeting Sunday between Mitchell and Defence Minister Ehud Barak, the U.S. envoy called relations between Israel and the United States strong. He added that the U.S. commitment to Israel's security is unbreakable.

Barak travelled to Washington with the prime minister.

Because of the meeting with Obama, who was initially due to be out of the country during Netanyahu's visit, the Prime Minister's Office decided to defer his scheduled visit to NATO headquarters and the European Union in Brussels.

Yoffie urges east Jerusalem moratorium

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — The leader of the Reform movement called for a temporary moratorium on building in eastern Jerusalem.

In remarks delivered March 18 to the board of trustees of the Union for Reform Judaism, Rabbi Eric Yoffie noted Reform's commitment to Israel's claim to Jerusalem and its right to build there.

"The Union for Reform Judaism, like most American Jewish organizations, supports a united Jerusalem under Israeli sovereignty," the URJ president said. "This means that we believe housing units constructed in Jerusalem by Israel are not settlements and they are not illegal. But a great many things that are legal are not prudent or wise, and building in Arab sections of Jerusalem in the current political climate is one of those things."

Rabbi Yoffie recommended the moratorium as a means of easing tensions with the United States sparked this month when Israel announced a major building start in Jerusalem during a visit by U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden aimed at showing U.S.-Israel unity. The announcement also led the Palestinian Authority to pull back from planned renewed peace talks.

"Surely no opportunity to move toward an enduring settlement must be squandered," he said. "I hope that the government of Israel will see the declaration of a temporary moratorium on building in east Jerusalem as a means of seizing the initiative, deepening her ties with America, rallying her allies around the world, and challenging the Palestinians and Arab world to come forward with confidence-building steps of their own."

Among U.S. Jewish Jewish groups, Rabbi Yoffie and the Reform movement tack toward an aggressive U.S. posture in brokering Israeli-Arab peace, something its leaders have made clear in meetings with the Obama administration. However, Rabbi Yoffie also has assertively defended Israel from what he sees as unfair attacks in recent months, particularly against calls on Israel to face war crimes charges after last year's Gaza war.

In related news, AIPAC's president and a key donor to U.S. President Barack Obama's campaign urged the White House to keep differences with Israel private.

"Allies should work out their differences privately," Lee Rosenberg said to a standing ovation in his inaugural speech as president of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

Speaking at AIPAC's annual policy conference in Washington, Rosenberg described the tensions between Israel and the United States as "very unfortunate" and made it clear he believed Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had done his part in apologizing for the announcement of construction plans for a Jewish neighbourhood in eastern Jerusalem during Biden's visit this month.

"How friends disagree, how they react when missteps occur, that can determine the nature of the relationship," Rosenberg said.

He suggested that the Obama administration should focus its pressure on the Palestinians to bring them back to peace talks.

"The reluctant partner in this peace process is not Israel's elected leader, Prime Minister Netanyahu. The recalcitrant partner are the Palestinians and their leader: President Mahmoud Abbas," he said.

Rosenberg, a Chicago-based venture capitalist, was a key fundraiser for Obama's presidential bid.

Wishing all of our clients, colleagues and friends a happy & healthy Passover.

Knesset will consult with Diaspora on conversions

JTA

JERUSALEM — An Israeli lawmaker told a delegation of U.S. Jewish leaders that he would consult with Diaspora Jewry on issues involving conversion.

David Rotem, the author of a bill that will allow local rabbis in Israel to perform conversions to Judaism, made his comments last week during a meeting in the Knesset with Diaspora Jewish leaders led by Jewish Agency Chairman Natan Sharansky and Jewish Federations of North America senior vice-president Rebecca Caspi.

Overseas Jewry is concerned about a provision in the conversion bill that says a convert to Judaism who visited Israel before converting either in Israel or overseas would be prohibited from becoming an Israeli citizen under the Law of Return.

The Jewish Federations of North America has issued a statement strongly rejecting the proposal and has written directly to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on the subject.

Explaining that no law would be passed before the Knesset's Passover break, Rotem assured the group that no future bill would affect the status of conversions done outside of Israel. Rotem, of the Yisrael Beiteinu party, also stressed that Netanyahu is aware of the importance of these issues for Jews around the world.

"From my conversations with the prime minister and the government secretary, it is clear that the law that is viewed as problematic by Jews in the Diaspora will not be passed during the current Knesset session which goes into recess on March 21," Sharansky said. "We have received assurances that we will be consulted in this process, so that the views of world Jewry are taken into consideration."

Hamas terrorist arrested

Israel arrested a senior Hamas terrorist who was said to be responsible for the deaths of more than 70 Israelis. Maher U'dda was arrested in a joint Israeli army, Shin Bet and Israel Police operation. U'dda, 47, has been wanted in Israel for more than a decade. He is reported to have been involved in terror activity including the twin terror attacks at Cafe Hillel in Jerusalem and at the bus stop near the Tzrifin military base in central Israel on Sept. 9, 2003. U'dda had been held in a Palestinian prison for a number of months in 1998 and then released.

Unarmed soldiers attacked

Three unarmed Israeli soldiers who accidentally entered the Arab-controlled area of Hebron were attacked and wounded. The soldiers, stationed near Hebron, lost their way last Thursday during a physical training exercise. When they realized they were lost, the soldiers asked a local Palestinian for directions to Kiryat Arba, on the outskirts of Hebron. They were directed instead into the heart of Arab Hebron, where they were attacked. All of the soldiers required medical attention. One remained hospitalized last Thursday night.

Lula lays wreath for Arafat

Brazil's president laid a wreath at former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's grave after refusing to visit the grave of Theodor Herzl. President Luiz Ignacio Lula da Silva met with Palestinian Authority leaders last Wednesday in Ramallah. "I dream of an independent and free Palestine living in peace in the Middle East," Lula said while in the West Bank. "I believe the Palestinians and Israelis are going to share the land of their forefathers." Israel had criticized Lula's plan to visit the grave of the PLO leader prior to the visit. Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman boycotted Lula's address to the Knesset March 15 to protest his refusal to visit the grave of Herzl, the founder of modern Zionism.

Bezalel Academy moving

The Bezalel School of Arts and Design plans to build an $80-million campus in downtown Jerusalem. Proponents say the plans will help revive the city centre. The first phase of the new campus plans has been completed and detailed plans are now being drawn up, Bezalel president Amon Zuckerman, told JTA. Building is set to begin in the summer of 2011 and will take four years. The academy is currently located on Mount Scopus. It will move to Jerusalem's Jaffa Road. The move is expected to strengthen the identity of Jerusalem as a cultural centre as well as a historic centre, bringing visitors and audiences to the heart of Jerusalem, Zuckerman said. It also will bring 3,000 students and 500 faculty members into downtown Jerusalem.

PA presses on with Goldstone

The Palestinian Authority is acting to set up a standing committee to monitor implementation of the United Nations' Goldstone report on last winter's Gaza war on a permanent basis, and to assess the credibility of Israeli investigations into allegations from the report. In a move that has angered Israel, the PA has submitted a draft resolution proposal regarding this committee to the UN Human Rights Council, which was scheduled to meet in Geneva this week to discuss the Goldstone report's implementation.

Settlements jeopardize peace process, Clinton says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said that indirect talks between Israel and the Palestinians should be serious and substantive, warning that new Israeli settlements in east Jerusalem and the West Bank are jeopardizing progress in the peace process and undermining U.S. mediation.

"New construction in east Jerusalem or the West Bank undermines mutual trust and endangers the proximity talks that are the first step toward the full negotiations that both sides want and need," Clinton said in a speech to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), an influential pro-Israel lobby group, at its annual conference in Washington.

"It exposes daylight between Israel and the United States that others in the region could hope to exploit. And it undermines America's unique ability to play a role – an essential role, I might add – in the peace process," she said on Monday.

Clinton's speech underscored the Obama administration's "rock solid" commitment to Israel's security and its future, but she added that the United States was prepared to "tell the truth when it is needed" regarding the situation in the Middle East.

"Guaranteeing Israel's security is more than a policy position for me. It is a personal commitment that will never waver," Clinton said. "As Israel's friend, it is our responsibility to give credit when it is due and to tell the truth when it is needed."

The secretary of state added that Israel faces "difficult but necessary choices" on the road to Mideast peace because the status quo with the Palestinians was unsustainable.

Clinton stressed Washington's view that "the dynamics of demography, ideology and technology" would eventually force political change in the region.

"There is another path. A path that leads toward security and prosperity for all the people in the region. It will require all parties – including Israel – to make difficult but necessary choices," she said.

Clinton told AIPAC delegates that the United States would continue to demand that Hamas, the Islamist Palestinian group that controls the Gaza Strip, renounce violence and recognize Israel. She also repeated U.S. calls for the release of captured Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

She also said the United States would continue to press for direct negotiations that could lead to a two-state solution for Israel and the Palestinians, with U.S. Mideast peace envoy George Mitchell's efforts to start indirect "proximity" negotiations as an essential foundation.

"These proximity talks are a hopeful first step, and they should be serious and substantive. Ultimately, of course, it will take direct negotiations to work through all the issues and end the conflict," she said.

In related developments, European Union foreign ministers met in Brussels on Monday to look for ways to pressure Israelis and Palestinians into launching proxy peace talks, amid fears that the peace process is in jeopardy.

"There's a lot to discuss on… how we can keep the pressure on to get the proximity talks moving… We think that the settlements should stop. Most importantly we believe the talks should begin," the EU's foreign-policy director, Catherine Ashton, said.

She was talking shortly after returning from her first official visit to the Middle East. That visit was largely overshadowed by Israel's decision to expand its settlement building.

The EU is "very disappointed by the position of the Israeli government, I think I can say very clearly that Jerusalem is not Tel Aviv," said Luxembourg Foreign Minister Jean Asselborn, stressing the EU's position that Jerusalem should function as the capital of both the Israeli and a future Palestinian state.

Asselborn's comment was in reference to a declaration made by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu a day earlier: "Our policy on Jerusalem is the same policy followed by all Israeli governments for the 42 years, and it has not changed," Netanyahu said. "As far as we are concerned, building in Jerusalem is the same as building in Tel Aviv."

Asselborn said: "The Israeli people do not want to be in the position where, every time the international community takes a step forwards, they take a step back and do something to make sure that peace talks can't start again."

But ministers remained at odds over the question of how to put more pressure on Israel. The EU is the country's largest trading partner, but has so far ruled out any calls for trade sanctions.

Israel & the Jewish World

Chimen Abramsky was a noted Jewish historian

By PAUL SHAVIV

TORONTO — Prof. Chimen Abramsky, one of the most formidable intellects among 20th-century Jewish historians, passed away in England on March 15 at the age of 93.

Abramsky was a son of the renowned Talmudist Rabbi Yechezkel Abramsky (1886-1976), author of the monumental, multi-volume commentary on the Tosefta, Chazon Yechezkel. Yechezkel Abramsky was exiled to Siberia under the Communist regime in Russia. He later was admitted to England and became head of the London Beth Din under Chief Rabbi Joseph H. Hertz.

Chimen Abramsky made his way to Palestine in the early1930s. He was a prominent Communist leader in the Yishuv, but devoted himself to studies of medieval and modern Jewish history at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem with the great historians of the "Jerusalem school." He later reached London, and for years managed a Jewish bookshop in the East End of London – "Shapiro, Vallentine" – which was owned by his wife's family.

He was appointed to the faculty of Jewish studies at University College London

Few who went to buy bar mitzvah presents, sets of machzorim or Haggadot, could have known that the diminutive, round-faced figure serving them, with a hat affixed to the back of his head (as a tribute to his trade), was one of Europe's leading communist intellectuals, expert on the writings of Marx, Engels and a host of Soviet and east European revolutionaries, or that at the back of the shop was a stock of world-class rare Hebraica and Judaica that he sold to universities and collectors all over the world.

Abramsky was an international expert on Jewish and Hebrew bibliography. For years, he was Sothebys' main consultant on Hebraica and Judaica. He was adviser to the now world-famous collector Jack Lunzer in building his collection, and he attempted to establish the royal provenance of the famous Bomberg Talmud acquired by Lunzer from Westminster Abbey.

In the 1970s, already in his 60s, and without advanced academic degrees, he was appointed to the faculty of Jewish studies at University College London, and was a visiting fellow at St. Antony's College, Oxford. He simultaneously taught a seminar on Marx at the London School of Economics, described to me by a non-Jewish participant as "talmudic." Abramsky was a master of footnotes, and was given to comments such as "Scholem's famous footnote number 36 revolutionized the world of Jewish history."

By 1975, he was appointed professor of Jewish studies at University College, London, an appointment that recognized his brilliance, but also leapfrogged over a group of other faculty, causing no little stir.

He published only occasional essays and studies. However, he influenced many scholars and historians in his twin fields of Jewish history and Marxist studies (he had left the Communist Party in 1956).

Of his two children, one, now Dame Jenny Abramsky, is the recently retired and highly respected very senior member of the BBC, credited with being one of the most outstanding producers – and the most senior female – in the history of that august institution, and a public figure in the United Kingdom. .

Her father – totally immersed in Jewishness, fluent in the arcane worlds and works of eastern European Jewish history, and very reverent of his father's memory and legacy – was, however, a very private person who took no prominent part in Jewish community life.

Cal-Berkeley student gov't reportedly endorses divestment

JTA

SAN FRANCISCO — The student government at the University of California, Berkeley reportedly endorsed a divestment resolution.

The Associated Students of the University of California, Berkeley passed the resolution by a wide margin on March 18, it was reported.

The Daily Californian reported that the association was considering the move late the previous night.

The resolution calls for divestment of ASUC assets from General Electric and United Technologies "because of their military support of the occupation of Palestinian territories." It further claims that the move is not an expression of support for either Israel or the Palestinians, but rather is "a principled expression of support for universal human rights and equality."

Despite global efforts by pro-Palestinian groups, no American university has yet taken steps to divest specifically from firms alleged to support Israel's military presence in the Palestinian Authority. Last year, Hampshire College's trustees approved a measure to divest from 200 companies deemed to be in violation of the school's investment guidelines, among them a number of companies that do business with Israel.

A student group, Students for Justice in Palestine, initiated the process that led to that decision and subsequently claimed that the school had divested from Israel. The school denied that Israel had been targeted, an announcement endorsed by the Anti-Defamation League and Harvard Law School professor Alan Dershowitz.

The Berkeley bill specifically names Israel, which it accuses of "collective punishment" of the Palestinians as well as settlement expansion and the "blockade" of Gaza. It also recommends further divestment from other regions where war crimes are alleged to be taking place, naming Morocco, the Congo "and other places as determined by the resolutions of the United Nations and other leading international human rights organizations."

"Divesting from Israel is immoral, bigoted and if done by a state university illegal," Dershowitz said in a statement March 18. "It encourages terrorism and discourages peace. Any university that would actually divest from Israel will be subjected to countermeasures--financial, legal, academic and political. We will fight back against this selective bigotry that hurts the good name of the University of California."

JDC Haggadah includes historic Passover photos

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

The Passover seder can feel like a blessing or a curse, depending on whose table you're sitting at.

At the best of times it's an enlightening, relevant, entertaining and meaningful ritual. At its worst, the seder is arduous and too long, with insufficient correlations to modern-day circumstances and many a tummy rumble as dinnertime approaches ever so slowly.

What you need, in the latter circumstance, is a Haggadah that keeps your interest piqued with great images, quality pages and content that's riveting. If yours is a dull, aged Haggadah with none of the above, consider getting your hands on a copy of one of the following two releases.

The JDC Haggadah (Devora Publishing) is the perfect seder accompaniment, a handsome hardcover whose 88 pages combine the seder service with a series of fascinating photographs derived from the archives of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. Open it up and you'll see one page containing Hebrew and English seder prayers and songs, while the opposite page displays images from the archives and stories relevant to those images.

I paged through The JDC Haggadah with no prior knowledge of the JDCs work and found it a fascinating photograph album that pays tribute to the organization's many acts of charitable kindness over the years. There are pictures of Yemenite Jews conducting seders in Israel in the 1960s and Ethiopian Jews in Gondar in 1988. The images skip seamlessly between the years, contrasting 1935 scenes from Hungary with pictures from the Dominican Republic in the '40s, Israel in the '80s and the Soviet Ukraine in 1925.

Every image contains the faces or figures of Jews, oftentimes engaged in Passover rituals, prayer, Jewish summer camp or family life. The stories behind these pictures, with commentary by journalist and author Ari Goldman, are equally fascinating and give readers a greater depth of understanding about Jewish affliction all over the world, and how the JDC has helped improve lives quietly but steadily over the years.

The Haggadah portion of the book is clearly displayed in a good-size font so it's easy to follow. The only problem I foresee is that the JDC's photograph album and anecdotes are so interesting you could easily lose track of the seder service and find yourself engrossed in these stories all night. The good news is dinner will come faster. The bad news is, you might miss the seder all together!

A second new release is the Passover Haggadah in Another Dimension (Lambda Publishers Inc), which comes with a handy pair of 3D glasses for the reader. Slip on the glasses and the images on each page spring to life, a feature that can add fun to the service for children, especially.

There are pictures of figurines throughout the story of Exodus, including an Egyptian whipping a Jew, a depiction of the Four Sons and the Egyptians drowning in the Red Sea. They are cleverly crafted and certainly make the story more meaningful for the son – or daughter – who is too small to follow the verbal commentary at the table.

This Haggadah contains English, Hebrew and Hebrew transliterations. There's definitely more English than Hebrew, and much of the Hebrew is in a small font that makes it difficult to read and follow for English speakers.

But that's OK if you're a child more interested in the major chapters and songs of the seder sequence than in the tiny details. If you're a seder warrior for whom every word counts, though, stick to a Haggadah that's a little more traditional – and a little less gimmicky.

FILM FOCUSES ON THE HOLOCAUST IN ARAB LANDS

Lost Stories from the Holocaust in Arab Lands is a new documentary film that presents "a vast, lost history of what actually happened to the half-million Jews of the Arab lands of North Africa under Nazi, Vichy, and Fascist rule."

Based on a book by Robert Satloff, the film is scheduled for special community screenings in New York and Los Angeles until early April, and for broadcast on the American PBS network on Monday, April 12, 10 p.m.

The film, produced by MacNeil-Lehrer Productions and narrated by Robert MacNeil, asks the central question: did any Arabs save Jews during the Holocaust? It also sets out in search of a hopeful response to the problems of Holocaust ignorance and denial in the Arab world. Filmed on location in Tunisia, Morocco, France, Israel and the United States, the film, according to a press release, makes "surprising discoveries" that challenge both Arab and Jewish perceptions of this dark historic chapter.

The Simpsons head to Israel for Passover

The upcoming episode of The Simpsons, titled The Greatest Story Ever D'ohed, will feature the animated family in Israel.

Recently released scenes show Homer and Bart at the Western Wall with their Israeli tour guide, who will be voiced by British comedian Sascha Baron Cohen, of Borat fame.

In the episode, Homer gets "Jerusalem Syndrome" and believes that he's the Messiah. Also, the tour guide bickers and exchanges political barbs with Marge.

"This is an episode that people from all three [Abrahamic] religions will be equally offended by," said Simpsons producer Al Jean.

The show has featured many Jewish jokes and characters during its 21 seasons on the air, most prominently Krusty the Clown (whose Jewish name is Herschel Shmoikel Pinchas Yerucham Krustofski).

The episode will air in Canada on Global TV on March 28.

First-time novelist short-listed for prize

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

First-time novelist Michael Tregebov has gained international recognition.

Tregebov's novel, The Briss, published by New Star Books, was recently short-listed for best first book in this year's Commonwealth Writers' Prize.

Although he didn't win – the winner was Shandi Mitchell, the author of Under This Unbroken Sky – he's quite pleased.

"Actually, I was surprised my book was even published," said the Winnipeg-born writer. "After so many rejections, one more surprise was nothing I couldn't handle."

Michael Tregebov

Described by the Globe and Mail as "aggressively funny and stealthily horrific," The Briss is about a Canadian Jewish medical school dropout who visits Israel, falls in love with a Palestinian woman and impregnates her. The affair arouses the ire of his father, a Zionist and veteran of the 1948 War of Independence in Israel.

"At the narrative level, what interested me was the way political conflicts in families are sometimes the sublimation of other conflicts," said Tregebov in an interview from his home in Barcelona.

Tregebov, 55, said that Israel has played a major role in his identity.

"For my grandmother's generation, Jewish identity was defined in relation to the major political events of the day: socialism, anarchism, Yiddish culture versus Hebrew, assimilation and so on. Zionism was still very isolated from the mainstream.

"For my parents' generation, in Canada, Jewish identity was defined in relation to the issue of assimilation."

But after the 1967 Six Day War, Jewish identity became inextricably linked to Israel's fortunes, he added.

"What is happening now is that changes inside Israel are causing new turbulence in that identity. A small example: I have two Israeli friends, hardened Zionists born and raised in Israel, who refuse to visit Jerusalem because they can't stomach the religious Jews. When they told me this, I almost fell off my chair.

"And American policy is shifting, which is very important for the region and for how Jews will define themselves in relation to Israel."

Long before The Briss struck pay dirt, he wrote for himself, for the drawer, producing an assortment of unpublished manuscripts, one of which was similar to The Briss in terms of tone, time and place.

Tregebov began writing at the age of 14. "First, little plays for the theatre school in Winnipeg, then poems, then novels."

He earned a BA degree at the University of Manitoba, majoring in English literature and minoring in economics. In 1978, he completed an MFA degree in creative writing at the University of British Columbia.

Shortly afterward, he read Gabriel Garcia Marquez's novel, One Hundred Years of Solitude. He was so overwhelmed that he decided to learn Spanish and read it in the original language.

Tregebov has lived in Spain since 1983 and has made a living as a translator. "I mostly translate texts about chartered accountancy and tax and corporate law," said Tregebov, the translation director of PriceWaterhouseCoopers in Barcelona.

He also works on literary translations, having translated the South African novelist Nadine Gordimer into Spanish.

Recently, he finished translating William Carlos Williams' classic, Kora in Hell, into Spanish.

Tregebov is currently writing a novel whose working title is The Poorest Jew in America. "It's somewhat self-explanatory, I'm afraid," he said ruefully.

Vision's Beasts in the Bible explores myths and realities

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Bible brims with some pretty strange and mysterious creatures.

There is the whale that swallowed Jonah, the serpent that seduced Eve in the Garden of Eden and the angel that appeared before the prophet Ezekiel.

And then, of course, there are the winged insects and the frogs that devastated Egypt.

Beasts of the Bible, which will be presented by Vision TV on Wednesday, March 31 at 9 p.m., poses two enduring and interrelated questions: are these creatures merely mythical? Can they be found today?

In this speculative and interesting documentary, producer Ric Esther Bienstock grapples with these issues. She gets a whole lot of help from a host of experts and 3-D CGI technology.

Bienstock revisits the story of the four-legged serpent, which tempted Eve, against her better judgment, to taste the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge.

Rabbi Natan Slifkin holds a baby salamander.

Tiny spurs in the bodies of snakes indicate that serpents may once have had legs. On the other hand, could the serpent have been a poisonous salamander?

In biblical lore, Aaron's rod turned into a crocodile, one of ancient Egypt's most revered gods. Bienstock pursues this angle assiduously.

Of the 10 plagues that befell Egypt, touching off the Israelite exodus to the Promised Land, six were in the form of amphibians and insects. Bienstock lists frogs, mosquitoes, flies, hornets, gnats, wasps, locusts and even bacteria.

Beasts of the Bible speculates that Jonah could not have survived for three days inside the acidic body of a whale or a white shark until he was spit out. It posits that Jonah may really have been "swimming" in a constellation of stars, theorizing that this is really an issue of astronomy.

Much of the commentary is provided by a cavalcade of erudite historians, biblical scholars, archeologists and herpetologists.

Among them are Rabbi Natan Slifkin, a British-born Israeli lecturer and author on Torah and the natural world whose books became a subject of controversy among some haredim; Andy Orchard, the former director of the University of Toronto's Centre for Medieval Studies; Sara Poirier, an astronomer at the Ontario Science Centre; Jason Head, a paleontologist at the University of Toronto, and Aren Maeir, a professor of biblical and ancient Near Eastern archeology at Bar-Ilan University in Israel.

And thanks to the latest high-tech gimmickry, the stupendous beasts in the Bible come to full-throated life.

Singles try to connect in character-driven film

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Noah Baumbach's sensitive, character-driven film, Greenberg, turns on lost souls adrift in a sea of uncertainty.

The two central characters, Roger Greenberg (Ben Stiller) and Florence Marr (Greta Gerwig), may be made for each other romantically, but in terms of temperament they are worlds apart.

Whether they can connect and find peace of mind and a measure of happiness is the theme of this quiet, thoughtful movie about desperate lives in contemporary Los Angeles.

Greenberg, which is scheduled to open in Toronto on March 26, starts with a panoramic shot of the city smothered in its seemingly perpetual smog and then pans on Griffith Park, a favourite destination for joggers, strollers and dog walkers.

Florence, a sweet-tempered personal assistant in her mid-20s, is taking Mahler, her boss' German Shepherd, for a walk just before he and his family leave for Vietnam on a holiday.

Shortly after their departure, Roger arrives to house-sit for his brother while he is gone. The swanky house, set in the folds of the Hollywood Hills, is close to a chassidic neighbourhood.

Roger, 41, is a carpenter who can build everything but his own life. Recently released from a mental institution, he is a pill-popping former musician who lost a potentially lucrative record deal when he was much younger. Now at loose ends, he is vulnerable and embittered.

Greta Gerwig, Rhys Ifans and Ben Stiller star in Greenberg.

Roger, whose father was Jewish and whose mother was a Protestant, has a somewhat distant relationship with his Jewish background. Stiller, who himself is of Irish and Jewish descent, delivers a fine performance as a man searching for stability. With a lot of time on his hands, Roger looks up old friends. He spends much of his time with Ivan (Rhys Ifans), a former bandmate whose dream exploded and whose 10-year marriage has imploded.

Despite his best efforts, Roger is inexorably drawn to Florence, an aspiring singer who has just ended a long relationship but who has an affinity for casual sex.

Though Roger tends to be brusque and even abusive, Florence likes him immensely. A 1960s-type flower child, she's "impressed" by the fact that Roger is indifferent to success and is content "to do nothing." Gerwig is ideal for the role. She is soft-spoken, gentle, accommodating and naturalistic. There is not a mean bone in her body.

Roger, his judgment clouded by his medication or his abrasive personality, can't initially see that Florence is a wonderful human being who may be right for him.

This issue is never quite resolved, but in Greenberg, the possibilities seem endless.

Guilt over murder becomes part of author's imagination

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

It is impossible to begin reading Jacques Chessex's slim novel, A Jew Must Die without knowing what will happen in its climactic scene.

The original French title, Un Juif pour l'exemple, leaves something to the imagination. But for the English translation, published in 2009, the book's cover is inscribed with the phrases "1942, Switzerland, a Nazi plot... A novel based on a true story."

Norman Ravvin

The book's inner flap fills the reader in further, listing the place and time when "Arthur Bloch, a Jewish cattle merchant" from the borderlands shared by Switzerland and France is lured to a stable by Swiss Nazis and murdered.

When the murder scene does occur, it is drawn out over a page or two, making use of a certain cinematic suspense, yet the event itself, carried out as planned, is swift, violent and unsurprising.
